"Frequently the girl reporter finds herself no more useful than a fifth wheel, but when she is needed she must be ready to go and bring back the 'goods.' The girl reporter must become reconciled to having uninteresting assignments along with interesting assignments and to working as hard on the one kind as the other.

"I had a hard time getting on the Tribune staff," she said.

"The Tribune is not eager to add women to its staff, it seems to me, but once a woman is on the payroll she gets every chance that is given to a man, an opportunity to go as far as her industry and ability will take her."

Miss Forbes was graduated in 1916 from Northwestern University, where she had been a member of Kappa Alpha Theta sorority and of Phi Beta Kappa, honorary scholastic fraternity. Her ambition at that time was to become a reporter, but her family insisted she must teach. For that reason she went to the University of Chicago for graduate work in English and received a master's degree there in 1917. In 1917-1918 she said she was "25 per cent of the faculty of the high school at Waterloo, Ill."

During the summer of 1918 Miss Forbes worked on the Evanston (Ill.) News-Index and in October of that year she went to the Tribune as assistant exchange editor. Later she became exchange editor and then was assistant to the literary editor for a time before she got into general reporting.

Miss Forbes confesses that she did not scoop Chicago on her first assignment. That assignment was to interview a poor poet. Miss Forbes recalls that she took a handful of notes to the office and wrote a long story, not a word of which was printed.

"No, that first assignment was no scoop," she smiled, "and I am still getting scooped, right along. But to realize that one is scooped in my belief is the worst punishment a reporter can have.

"And please be sure to say that I am engaged to John Herrick, a reporter on the Tribune," Miss Forbes concluded as she said a cheery good-bye.

Away Back In 1791

The City of Paterson, New Jersey, was founded distinctly for a manufacturing city by Alexander Hamilton. The population of the United States was under 5,000,000 and its territory reached only to about Savannah, Ga., on the south and to the Mississippi River on the west. In the wonderful development of this country since that time Paterson has fairly held its place and has occupied a position in the front rank of manufacturing cities.

Paterson is the third city in the State and is an important part of the greatest industrial district of the United States. It is the leading silk manufacturing city of the country; and its other manufactured products range from shoe laces to locomotives; its modern retail shops are the buying centre for a population of more than 500,000 people.

Paterson is also the home city of thousands of persons engaged in business or employed in New York. It is a clean, up-to-date American city which takes an advance stand on matters pertaining to the happiness and welfare of its people. It has a population of approximately 140,000 people, with savings deposits of $60,894,956.13.

It has 1200 manufacturing establishments employing about 50,000 people with an annual value of products of $225,000,000 and annual wages of nearly $40,000,000.

Paterson is primarily an evening paper field and The Press-Guardian is its leading evening newspaper, reaching about 14,000 homes in Paterson and in the thriving suburban towns every evening, being a real home-delivered newspaper — independent financially and politically and run by newspaper men of experience who have no political ambitions and who do try to serve the people of Paterson and vicinity honestly and fearlessly.

Paterson, because of its happy combination as a residential and industrial city, offers an ideal city to try out advertising campaigns at a nominal cost.

A Message from
New England to Old England

THE six New England States offer exceptional inducements to British firms who are seeking commercial expansion in the United States.

New England is the most remarkable merchandising zone in America. It is an extremely populous and compact territory with great wealth evenly distributed. The great concentration of population in New England is convincingly demonstrated by the fact that 7,500,000 people live within a few hours of Boston, the Hub of New England, by steam road, electrics or automobile. There are more than 6,700,000 people within five hours of Boston and 5,000,000 within three hours of Boston. There are 4,000,000 people living in Boston's every day trading territory—the fifty mile zone.

New England is the Financial Cornerstone of the United States. While it has only 7 percent of the total population it possesses practically 40 percent of the nation's deposits in savings banks. New England's wealth has increased more than 100 percent during the 10-year period 1912-1922—the only group of States to achieve this record. The per capita wealth of the New England States is far greater than that of the general average for the United States. The 1922 per capita wealth of the United States was $2,918; for New England $3,306.

One out of every Three families in this remarkable Territory Influenced by Boston Sunday Advertiser

The faith and confidence which New Englanders have in the BOSTON SUNDAY ADVERTISER is emphasized by the fact that more than 500,000 families—one out of every three families in New England — regularly buy the BOSTON SUNDAY ADVERTISER. With a circulation of more than 360,000 in the fifty mile zone the BOSTON SUNDAY ADVERTISER influences one of every two families in Boston's great everyday trading territory.

The BOSTON SUNDAY ADVERTISER has a commanding lead over all the other Boston newspapers, morning, evening or Sunday. The total circulation of the BOSTON SUNDAY ADVERTISER is at least 140,000 greater than that of the second largest Boston Sunday newspaper and 145,000 greater than that of the leading daily newspaper.

"KNOW YOUR OBJECTIVE" IS FIRST RULE IN DEVELOPING NEW ADVERTISING

Haphazard Plans Leave Prospects Cold, C. W. Hoyt Declares —Says Advertising Not a Substitute for Salesmanship

By CHARLES W. HOYT

President, Charles W. Hoyt Company, Inc.

WHEN EDITOR & PUBLISHER requested me to write an article on developing new advertising accounts, I asked myself whether or not we had a record of achievement in that direction which permitted me to talk or write on such a subject. I referred to some figures which had been prepared some time ago based on the advertising accounts handled in our office. I found that 64 per cent of the business which we were handling came from manufacturers whom we had developed as advertisers, which means from firms who had not invested in advertising up to the time that they started with us.

C. W. HOYT

Other figures showed the total amount of the original appropriations of the customers represented by this 64 per cent. The appropriations which they were running at the time I obtained the figures were a little more than 3 times as great as their original appropriations.

I looked over the starting of these different accounts and considered the methods which had been employed at the start. I also looked into the history of some accounts which had started years ago and which have not developed. From these things I made a few deductions as to the proper procedure in the starting of accounts. I gathered a few conclusions as to what was necessary to insure the greatest possibilities that the accounts would grow and be successful.

What would you think if you went to the railroad station, approached a train, asked the conductor where the train was going and suppose the conductor told you to step on board and to take your chances? Suppose he said to you, "Well, I don't know just where we're going—all I can tell you is that we're going to start." Suppose he said further that possibly he would take you to Poughkeepsie or he might go on to Albany, or when he reached Poughkeepsie, he might take a switch and go over on the Central New England Railroad to Danbury. What would you think of that sort of a railroad?

Yet, from my observations I believe that many firms when starting to advertise, do so with about as much uncertainty regarding their destination as is illustrated by this example.

The first thing necessary for the successful starting of an advertising account is to have a plan. You can't sail on unknown seas unless you have a chart. Years ago I began to run a boat. I studied the methods which permitted me to enter unknown harbors. I came to have a great respect for the charts provided by the United States Government, showing as they do by various marks, every source of danger and pointing out the channels and the ways in which a boat can arrive at its destination. So with an advertiser. An advertiser ought to have a chart and on that chart he ought to plot the course which he proposes to take. Before he charts his route, he must know where he desires to go.

Many failures in manufacturing and business in general come from the failure properly before hand to lay out a policy, a program or plan.

Time and time again I have seen advertisers start by deciding to put a few advertisements in a certain paper. They feel, I suppose, that this makes advertisers of them. Time and time again in my early days when I was not in a position to pick and choose, I was obliged to accept from those who wished to be advertisers, orders to go into certain papers or to run certain kinds of copy. I have been in business 15 years as an advertising agency, and there is not today on the books of our company, a single account started in this transient way.

I have not the space in which to outline what I mean by building a plan. I can only touch on a few points which the plan should certainly cover.

In the first place it is necessary in the majority of cases, if advertising is to produce the greatest results for a new advertiser, that the policy of the advertising should be sold to the sales department. Advertising is not a sibstitute for salesmen and salesmanship. No advertising, except in the case of a few articles, can ever hope to achieve its greatest results unless behind it is the man-power of the sales department. The plan, therefore, should provide for a selling of the plan to the sales department.

Many advertisers start to advertise without knowing the market conditions. Sometimes a market investigation will reveal that it is unwise for the advertiser to start at all. It is not right to say that anything can be advertised. Some people start too late. Already some fields have been so well covered by competitors that it would be really a mistake for an advertiser to start. Therefore, one requirement of successfully starting an advertising account should be a careful survey of market conditions.

After a market investigation has been made, after a complete study of the necessary policies surrounding the proposition has been made, it requires trained men to translate these findings into a plan. There are many thinsg that research may develop. One that I have commonly found is that the proposed advertiser may have the wrong set-up for consumer prices, discounts to the retailer, and discounts to the jobber. A trained advertising man or a man trained in marketing can often suggest changes in the discounts and in the ultimate price which may mean the difference between failure and success.

Another thing that those who know how can do, is to make a plan commercially practical. A marketing plan is of no value unless it provides for making money. A marketing plan should be built so that it is just as intelligible as a balance sheet. In building such a plan there should be constant reference to such figures as can be furnished by a certified accountant.

If a new advertiser will build his plan carefully or have it built by men who know how, he will be in a better position to decide on his advertising agency and on his advertising.

The test of the plan builder is the showing which he can make as to what has happened to the plans he has built. If a man or an organization can show to a new advertiser that he has built a large number of plans and that these plans have come through and been successful, then he has a reason for asking for the new advertiser's business.

There are tremendous opportunities in this great United States of ours. If I have not derived anything else from the 15 years that I have been conducting the business of an advertising agency, I should be satisfied with the vision which it has given me, because of having seen numerous firms start small and achieve great success. All over the country and particularly in the East, are firms which are 3 generations old.

A young man or a young firm might think that in competition with these firms he has no chance for success. Fortunately there are any number of examples of firms which started to advertise less than 10 years ago, and in competition with firms 3 generations old, have grown to enormous size and made great profits. Business stands waiting for those who deserve to obtain it. It will not come to us often, but often if we go after it, we will obtain it. This is a golden age of opportunity to those who will.

NEW N. Y. DAILY

Enwright's Evening Bulletin Scheduled to Appear June 19

The New York Evening Bulletin, new Democratic daily newspaper of which Frederick W. Enwright is owner and publisher, scheduled its appearance for Thursday, June 19.

Its advent of the new paper was announced in paid advertisements in the daily press.

In a statement signed by Enwright the Bulletin was sloganized as a "daily newspaper for plain people."

"I am going to give you a real newspaper, and it will be a clean one that your children at home can read without being tainted by sordid stories," the advertisement read. "The Bulletin, in politics, will be solidly Democratic, because today the Democratic party is the political organization of plain people."

Enwright stated the Bulletin had "come to New York to stay," declaring a long lease had been taken on the building which will house his plant, and that all modern equipment has been purchased and installed.

Artist Sues Ad Agency

A suit for $10,000 was recently begun by George Bellows, painter and illustrator, against P. F. Collier & Sons, publishers of Collier's Weekly, for altering one of his pictures, by having strips cut out of it. Mr. Bellows alleges that the alterations tended to hold him up to scorn and ridicule by "fellow artists at home and abroad."

Lineage Record on Coast

TO EDITOR & PUBLISHER:

Speaking of "What, if anything, is the matter with general business." The Everett Daily Herald broke all records in April for advertising carried during any month since it has been published. In May the Herald carried more advertising than in April, again breaking all previous records.

This is a pretty good indication that there is nothing very much wrong with business in Everett and the Pacific Northwest.

TRAILING BIG NEWS WITH THE CAMERAMEN

Holes in Derby Hats and Cameras Down Trouser Legs Aid in Photogrophers' Meticulous Search for Pictures—Diplomacy and Nerve Necessary for Success

Related by Jack Price, Photographer, to Peter Vischer, Reporter, both of the N. Y. World Staff

NEWSPAPERS large and small nowadays get news pictures from all corners of the earth, snapped while the story is breaking and printed before it is cold, from the dozen great picture syndicates. Most newspapers, too, support a camera staff, be it the metropolitan force of 10 or 15 photographers, or the pair of local reporters whose cameras go everywhere with them. For pictures tell the story and the opprobrious "Words! Words!! Words!!!" cannot be applied to a page that is dressed with interesting photographs.

And so, with a staff of photographers on the job every day and the output of the syndicate, big newspapers inevitably accumulate thousands of prints. Perhaps one in ten is printed, but the others do not follow overset news to the Land of Spikes. They are priceless. A picture that today seems to have been nothing but a waste of time and material may be invaluable tomorrow. A story may break that will turn the dullest snapshot into a treasure to be guarded by the head office-boy himself.

It's exciting, the photographic game. Oftentimes a photographer knows he will have time to take just one picture. There won't be a chance in the world to change holders or shift his position. If he snaps the shutter a moment too soon or too late, he's beaten by the smarter man next to him.

At other times the photographer has to do things harder than facing danger: he has to show tact and diplomacy, sympathy and the milk of human kindness. Tact and sympathy and just plain decency are required after every disaster, every death, every scandal. He needs rarer judgment than the reporter at times, for he cannot work through a half-opened door, or through a lawyer, or through a veil of lace or silence.

It isn't all thrilling, of course. One might stretch the imagination some to call two weeks at Palm Beach or Narragansett thrilling, but hardly a second-rate yacht race, or the new fuel administrator, or a liquor raid. At best the general run of feature pictures is comfortable, or sad.

But it is interesting, with a constant change and an even chance of "shooting" the great news events of the world. It's a game for the man who believes in luck. Take the case of the photographer assigned to take feature pictures of the opening of the New York State Barge Canal—unexciting enough, in all conscience.

"Sam," he told the Negro night boat porter, "if the Capitol's on fire, wake me good and early; otherwise, don't bother me till doomsday."

Early in the morning came excited knocks on the door.

That photographer's paper pictured the Capitol ablaze by noon in New York. It was a clean-up by hours. And luck.

And remember that day when Mayor Gaynor sailed for a European vacation? One photographer came late, after most of his rivals were on their way off the boat. He rushed aboard, nevertheless, leveled his camera, and snapped the shutter—just as the Mayor staggered forward struck down by a would-be assassin's bullet.

Crime is the assignment that taxes most the newspaper photographer. He must forget all but his objective. He has no whims, no pleasures, no privileges, no desires. He has no hours. He has only his duty to his paper—to stick and to get, and never to quit his assignment for an instant.

He is usually "on his own" on an important crime story. Sent out with the first flash that reaches the city editor, he knows nothing but the locality where the crime was committed. Canvassing the situation at top speed, he cannot be oblivious to the slightest detail.

Snapshot photograph of former Mayor William Gaynor of New York an instant after a would-be assassin's bullet had found its target. Believed to be the most remarkable news picture ever made. Taken by William Warnecke of the New York World staff, August 9, 1910.

Easiest to get is the picture of the scene of the crime; it is as well the poorest. Vastly more important is the photograph of the victim, which must be obtained from friends, relatives, of business associates, from some photographer in the neighborhood, the woman in the case—or even from the morgue. Vital also are pictures of the victim's friends and associates, his rivals and enemies—for among them may be the criminal. Necessary are the pictures of witnesses, or possible witnesses. Interesting are pictures of the detectives and prosecutors.

Then there was the opera star, married, who locked herself in her stateroom, refusing every request to come out and be photographed. The camera men were righteously indignant and at a loss for a moment or two until one nimble-wit walked to the door and rapped boldly.

"Who's there?" came the lyric tones from within.

"'Tis I, dearest," replied the knight of the lens, taking a long chance on unaccustomed language.

It worked. The door opened ever so slightly, but far enough to admit no less than seven camera men. The singer laughingly capitulated.

Another famous example involved a society matron, a dowager of regal mien and scornful eye. She wouldn't see photographers, or reporters, or anyone else. Her statesroom door remained locked until inspiration visited one of the besiegers. This camera man had a stentorian voice, like the city editor of fiction. Walking to the stateroom door, he cupped his hands to his mouth while his companions in deviltry aimed their machines.

"All ashore that's going ashore!" he bellowed.

Just as troublesome as these are the people who are too anxious to face the camera—theatrical folk seeking publicity, clothing salesmen with new models, ladies with new anklets or trick diamond-studded garters. As pests they are almost in the class of the newspaper photographers themselves, which is going some.

And, of course, celebrities can always be "shot" if they are badly wanted. Everyone has to get off a steamer sooner or later. Usually, too, they have to stand in line for landing cards. Often they have to attend to baggage and greet friends. Any photographer who cannot get one picture out of these three chances might better join the longshoremen on the pier.

All steamship lines now supply camera men with lists of returning celebrities. Most lines send representatives on the cutter with the reporters and photographers who not only assist in the work but see to it that newspaper men get a real dinner after their job is done. The White Star line has even installed a studio with a platform and special lights so that passengers can be photographed in comfort regardless of upper-deck weather conditions.

The lines have also made easy the photographing of outgoing passengers. The difficult ones—those who rush aboard at the last minute, or more clever yet, board the night before sailing, present problems for the quick and ingenious. Both classes are usually caught.

And your camera man is a snobbish person, too. Though chauffeurs, policemen, and even editors have done it time and again, there is no record of a newspaper photographer having married into what is known as high society. But, it happens that camera men figure prominently in the social world.

"There's Mrs. G.," one of the youngest of a group of photographers at the Easter parade might say enthusiastically, unlimbering his camera.

"Don't bother with her," the veteran probably counsels. "Her grandfather

On to London!

The Los Angeles Times Wishes You a Bon Voyage

Have a good time; get lots of new ideas; and in brushing up your international facts—remember —

The city of London was mentioned by Tacitus, A.D. 61, as "a great commercial resort," although the exact date of its founding is a disputed point among historians.

Most authorities agree, however, that London was founded approximately seventeen centuries before Los Angeles, California.

London exceeds all other cities in the west of Europe in population, wealth, number of manufacturing establishments and value of building permits.

The city with the largest population, most wealth, greatest number of manufacturing establishments and largest building operations on the west coast of the American continent is Los Angeles, California.

London, apart from its eminent position in commerce, manufacturing and banking, is a world rendezvous of distinguished writers, artists, scientists, travelers and scholars; and in this respect is also like its great cosmopolitan American cousin and world capital of motion pictures—Los Angeles, California.

London is the home of the newspaper having the largest circulation of any newspaper on earth.

The home of the largest newspaper in the world and the newspaper printing the greatest volume of reading matter and advtertising, is Los Angeles, California.

London prints in its morning newspapers what England thinks and does during the preceeding night.

wasn't anybody. But there's Mr. S.; he's a regular guy. And darned if that isn't Miss W. She's going to have a spiffy wedding with Count M. de V. in the Fall. They're folks you want."

Then the cameras would click.

Camera men working society follow different tactics than when busy on crime or on sports. They invariably work in a group, with the veteran in unofficial command. The youngsters watch and study the leader, follow him around, snap when he does, ask lots of questions, and in time learn, like the veteran, not only to recognize true leaders of society and distinguish them from the picture-hungry hopefuls, but to exchange with these leaders, as does the veteran, a greeting that is cordial on both sides. Many of the most human folks in the highest strata of society—such as Mr. and Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney, the late Mrs. George J. Gould, Mrs. Oliver Harriman—become quite friendly.

Of course, the thing can be overdone, as in the case of the photographer who learned to know so many in society that he left his paper flat to open a studio on 5th avenue. His latest feat was to tie up exclusively for himself the recent Mackay wedding. That was friendship developed with a vengeance.

Not so many years ago, however, the photographer was as welcome in the haunts of high society as a rotten apple in a grocery store. Newport was a terror. Bailey's Beach, for instance, could not be reached at all. In fact, some photographers who insisted upon learning that for themselves wound up in the hospital. Other fashionable resorts were little better, though hardly a big newspaper or syndicate failed to cover these places during the season.

Persistency finally won out. Society folk learned that camera men did not want to molest them, nor even ask questions annoying or otherwise, but simply to get pictures—good ones if possible, but horrible pictures if none better could be obtained.

And so nowadays Southampton, more modern than the playgrounds of a few years ago, is rather easy. Palm Beach, Miami, Pensacola, do not offer strenuous objections. Some hotels there even pay expenses if photographers will only come and bring along their cameras. Though there is still some opposition, the thoroughbreds have learned not to blink or dodge when a camera is aimed. They sail right on in truly regal manner; in fact, it's one of the blood-tests. Only the climbers protest that they "cawn't be photograwphed"—and then look their consternation when the camera man cruelly takes their word for it.

The late J. Pierpont Morgan always shunned the camera. His son, J. P. Morgan, has never become reconciled to being photographed, though he will not "duck a shot." On the other hand, the notoriously camer-shy John D. Rockefeller is coming around—has come around. His picture used to be guarded like a bottle of old wine, but, suddenly, within the past year, he has become a "lens hound" and the files are chock full of him. His son, John D., Jr., is easy to get.

Experienced cameramen soon find out the nature of the story in hand. A "cheap" murder, involving people of no account, with only sordid details and no element of mystery, no application to the common denominator of the paper's readers, gets its stick or two of type—and no pictures. But, a "big" murder, involving prominent or interesting people, wealth, position, a triangle, perhaps a church or great social organization, and mystery, is worth all the pictures that can be obtained.

On a "big" story, the photographer is relentless in his efforts to get pictures with the least delay. There are probably hundreds of parallels for the Chicago photographer who obtained a picture of a murdered man, tactfully enough, from his wife before she knew he had been killed.

On a recent murder near New York, one woman very prominent in the case refused to be photographed. No recent pictures were available. A photographer rented a room in the adjacent house and sat day after day with a long-focus lens aimed at her garden waiting for her to come out for a breath of fresh air.

Often camera men on a crime story blaze a trail to solution of the mystery that reporters and detectives have to follow. Their meticulous search for pictures often turns up clues of the highest importance. And, unhappily, some camera men sometimes come upon clues that did not exist until planted by that same man who photographed them. Beware of bullets and rusty knives and bloody handkerchiefs found near the scene of a crime after the search has been completed!

Nerve, alertness and rare judgment are all necessary to the camera man on a crime story. Invariably he gets only one chance to snap the shutter, and he cannot miss. Doubly difficult is the one shot because it is usually directed against a person well guarded, who is using his sharpest wits to avoid the lens. During the early days of the recent case near New York, the principal was carefully shielded from camera by his own will and the bulk of lawyers, friends and beefy detectives.

With such a subject, photographers usually work in combination. They cover every door of the courthouse or building from which the person might emerge and the man who gets the picture gives a copy to every other photographer present.

Sometimes another trick is used. As the subject comes out of the building, he sees one or two cameras aimed at him; instinctively, he shields his face on that side and turns the other way. That is exactly what was wanted, for on the other side of his face are not two or three, but half a dozen camera men. The two who got nothing but an excellent likeness of a hat or a hand share the success of the undiscovered battery.

Spectacular robberies are almost as interesting as murders. A recent jewel robbery in New York furnished such color as men and women of prominence, wealth, blackmail, cards, liquor, a holiday party and a collection of valuable jewelry. Here again, all sorts of methods were used to obtain pictures. Photographers watched all exits of the hotel. Some of them tried to sneak upstairs disguised as messenger boys and florist's delivery men. They bribed attendants. Pictures resulted.

Trials and arraignments give plenty of trouble. Cameras are generally forbidden; camera men barred. Spectacular cases usually find the presiding judge specifically forbidding pictures with a little speech, barbed with a threat of contempt of court for disobedient photographers. That's just a nuisance to crack photographers; it means that they have to "sneak their shots." Big cameras are abandoned for little boxes that slip into side-pockets or down trouser-legs. Sometimes a photographer enters the trial room with a derby hat that is no less than disreputable, but the hole in its top means something.

During a murder trial on Long Island, the presiding judge had the entire courthouse guarded and threatened fines and prison for any photographer who dared snap a shutter. It looked hopeless, but one day a camera man leisurely walked toward a window of the trial room. They were always doing that, and he drew no attention until suddenly a flash flared. His Honor grew red and indignant. The photographers stood astounded. Guards started a chase of the daring photographer who was streaking toward the railroad station.

He wasn't caught. He had practiced and timed that run carefully. And, by chance or design, he just managed to catch the rear-end of the departing train. The guards missed it. That picture wasn't shared with those of slower wit and shorter legs.

And now we come upon a greedy and harassing pack, snarling and growling, bellowing, snorting, barking, perhaps cajoling with sinister grinning, circling round its prey, waiting for a chance to snap.

They know whom they are after, these photographic stalkers who left the Battery aboard the cutter at 7 a. m. The veterans immediately start below on a still hunt. Youngsters and lazy ones and timid ones—if such there be—wait for the hunters to bring the quarry to the sunny top deck, where the unwritten law prescribes that all subjects must be shared.

Surprising and often amusing is the process to distinguished foreigners, meeting this photographic reception for the first time. Often they can do little but gape at the "curious Americans." Prince Christopher of Greece, for example, was intensely interested and not the least bit nettled when he was ordered about like a footman and told "Hey, Prince, do this," and "Hey, Prince, turn this way." Americans, accustomed to the camera barrage, often do not like it. Secretary Hughes, for one, usually finds the bickering and the bellowing most annoying.

Real celebrities seldom object being photographed. Sometimes they are surprisingly gracious, as was recently Mrs. Marshall Field, who, though an elderly lady, walked up three steep flights of stairs to be photographed. Financiers, obdurate before reporters, often face the camera willingly. Ganna Walska has streaks of aversion to the camera; then she is hard to shoot; Maudé Adams has recently gone to all sorts of trouble to avoid photographers.

At sporting events, photographing society is a pleasure. The races, hunts and polo matches bring out those who are primarily good sports, who will always play the game.

Formal social functions are more difficult. Camera men are always permitted at weddings—permitted to stand at the door and photograph whom they can as best they can. At funerals, naturally, nobody wants to be bothered. At some parties camera men are tolerated; at others barred. It depends on the host or the hostess.

On a scandal story that involves society! Then is when the camera man has his troubles. He is frankly hated and scorned and obstructed. Time is a factor here, too, and even on scandal stories is the work of the photographer becoming easier. Somehow those involved learn they are in for a picture and so they often stand for it just to get it done with. Furthermore, if they are really prominent socially, they know that dozens of pictures are on file anyway.

After all, whether the story has to do with charity or scandal, it's the same argument that surmounts the last of the barriers.

Did you ever hear a photographer spring this line?

"Lissen, lady. I've already got your picture. I took it when you weren't looking. And I'll bet it's terrible. So why don't you pose for me and let me do you justice?"

AD MEN WARNED AGAINST EXPENSIVE SERVICE AND OVER-SOLICITATION

Means Must Be Devised Whereby Advertising Can Be Measured in Its Relative Value, A. N. P. A. Ad Bureau Director Declares

By WILLIAM A. THOMSON

Director, Bureau of Advertising, A.N.P.A.

THE head of a firm which spends a million dollars a year for advertising, wrote to me as follows a short time ago:

W. A. Thomson

"We have come to the necessity for the determination of the relative values of various mediums of publicity. I am frank to say that my previous training and business activities have been along the more exact lines of production, accounting and finance. The greatest disturbing element in my personal responsibility for the expenditure of considerable sums for publicity lies in the intangibility of results and the seeming complete lack in the minds of those in the profession with whom I have come in contact of the necessity for any tangible proofs other than generalities and silver-tongued conversational salesmanship.

"I realize, of course, that as a whole, advertising does not permit of the proof that other branches of industrial effort provide. On the other hand, I am firmly of the opinion that ways and means must and will be devised whereby advertising as such can be measured in its relative value by means other than personal opinion."

Letters like these remind us of the fact that advertising men have a much bigger job ahead of them than merely creating more advertising and making new advertisers. In advertising, many are called and apparently everyone feels he is entitled to his guess. The wide diversity of opinion as to methods leads to fierce competition between sellers of space and service. Often the result is that more thought is given to the subject of making advertising pay the advertising man than to the more important problem of making it pay the advertiser.

It seems to be highly appropriate that newspaper men should be the first to accept the obligation of selling space with due regard to the advertiser's needs. Newspaper advertising has been the chief factor in the progress that has been made in reducing advertising to exact quantities. The very nature of our medium has made possible this advance in the mathematics of advertising results and our duty in this direction may well travel hand-in-hand with our self interest.

It may be pleasant and I am sure it is easy to criticize our competitors upon this score. But we have the bulk of all advertising and the responsibility which goes with that leadership and I think it will pay us better to examine carefully our own house.

Newspaper competition is keen and leads inevitably to over-solicitation. Too often we see the advertiser merely as someone who has some money to spend rather than a man with a problem to solve. If the successful solution of this problem has a direct bearing upon the future of advertising, it behooves us to remember that the advertiser and ourselves have a mutual interest. We must give some thought to what the advertiser gets out of what we sell him.

Let us be concrete on one example at least of over-solicitation.

Advertisers tell us they are often embarrassed in making a selection of newspapers in a given market by pressure which is brought to bear by competing publications through retail dealers. Each newspaper has its strong retail advocates and sometimes when these advocates are lined up to demand that the campaign run in one newspaper instead of another, the advertiser tells us he is often faced with the proposition of splitting a campaign and thereby robbing it of some of its effectiveness, spending an undue amount in a market or losing the good will of some of the stores.

Those of you who follow the work of the Bureau of Advertising of the A. N. P. A., which is being conducted in behalf of all newspapers on one hand and all national advertisers on the other, may have noticed that our recent literature and promotional efforts have been along the lines of helping the advertiser use newspaper advertising profitably. Primarily we are concerned in the Bureau with the promotion of the newspaper as a national medium and the creation of a larger volume of national newspaper advertising, but we have felt in recent years that our best effort on these lines lay in the direction of making newspaper advertising campaigns successful.

In the past couple of years, we have seen a number of advertising accounts slip away from the newspapers and go into other mediums. The fact that these losses were more than offset by the coming of other advertisers, does not, in our judgment, change the significance of the situation.

We have carefully analyzed all reports of unsuccessful newspaper campaigns that have come to us and have found almost invariably that these failures were due to a wrong use of our medium.

One of the commonest mistakes made by advertisers who do not use newspapers properly is the mistake made in the matter of schedules. The newspaper is published every day and is read every day by people who buy every day. If nothing is as dead as yesterday's paper, nothing is quite as alive as today's newspaper. For this reason the 30 odd million copies of newspapers which are sold each day in this country and Canada, and the 20 millions that are sold each Sunday are eagerly scanned by readers who want the news. Thus every new newspaper carries with it a distinct opportunity for the national advertiser.

In the face of this, there are still advertisers who use the newspaper once a week, once in 10 days or twice a month. It is in this class of advertisers that failures are most frequently reported. One of the strong preachments the Bureau of Advertising has made to advertisers has been this: Advertise frequently in order to take advantage as far as possible of the constantly renewed daily interest in newspapers.

In addition to this, we have tried to make advertisers plan their schedules to cover their selling seasons in all potential markets. We have strongly urged that newspaper advertising be run as long as people are buying the things which the advertiser makes. "Flash campaigns" rigged up to influence the trade are seldom conceived in good faith and cannot expect the support of the retailer who sells his goods unless a bona fide effort to create a consumer interest in these goods is made.

Advertisers often assert they cannot afford to advertise frequently and to have schedules of long duration. This statement is usually based upon the assumption that a newspaper advertisement must be big in order to be effective. Naturally we do not advocate the use of small copy unless an advertiser is obliged to consider it on the score of economy. But we do strongly advocate small copy if it is necessary for the advertiser to use it to insure frequent insertions.

I want to make at least a gesture toward fulfilling some instructions sent to me by your president, Frank T. Carroll, who said, "What the men who attend this convention want to know is how to develop more advertising for their respective papers."

I think a lot of us still persist in selling space based upon the things we like to know about our paper rather than upon the things the advertiser ought to know about the paper and its relationship to the market. We keep on advertising lineage claims when the advertiser wants to know what his chances are for doing a profitable business in our town.

I don't believe any statement of a newspaper's influence in a community is worth much without a further statement showing opportunities for selling goods in the community. The many analyses of market conditions made by newspapers all over the country have been big factors in building the large volume of national newspaper advertising. But I wonder whether or not we cannot make these analyses go a trifle further.

Suppose, in analyzing our market, we tackle the job with a view of finding undeveloped opportunities for national advertisers.

Isn't it possible to develop advertising in all lines by using this specific method rather than the general one of talking about the influence of our newspaper and the wealth of our community? These conventional facts, disclosed through the average survey, make a fine background for solicitation, but it seems to me that the advertiser, constantly looking for opportunities to advertise and constantly facing the growing cost of doing business, would jump at a proposal to enter a market if it were shown by simple mathematics that he had not yet reaped a genuine harvest of business. In this way we should be soliciting business with the advertiser's welfare strongly to the fore, but with our profit just as well assured in the background.

In traveling about the country, we seldom find the manufacturers of a community advertising in the town where their goods are made. This, of course, is in line with the well-known belief that distant pastures are attractive. I have been in many places where newspaper people were unable to tell me what they made in a certain factory whose big chimney reared itself above the horizon on the outskirts of the town. In other places I found fairly comprehensive information about the manufacturers, but this was due to the fact that these factories were called upon by newspaper solicitors only when the paper got out a special edition.

What's wrong with making a survey of the town for the special benefit of these local manufacturers to see how much distribution they have in their own city, and perhaps to show them a market right at their doors that they are overlooking?

What's wrong with making the unfinished business of every solicitor on our paper the development of a worth-while advertising account from a local manufacturer. Why not hang up a prize or a bonus, not for the man who increases a department store account from 500,000 lines a year to 750,000 lines, but for the man who makes a three-times-a-week advertiser out of the X. Y. Z. Hosiery Company, that makes good socks but has not yet got the people in its bailiwick to understand this fact.

It seems to me another way for individual newspapers to create more national advertising is to draw a sharper line against all forms of undesirable co-operation, including hook-up advertising with magazine campaigns and all guises and disguises of free publicity. Too often, because of the keen local competition, papers are played one against the other by advertisers and agents for extravagant and uneconomic co-operation. As long as the advertiser sees that by holding out a nickel's worth of copy to the newspaper, he can get anything he wants in the city, because the newspaper is afraid that its competitor may get a few lines extra if it isn't obliging to the point of business suicide, just so long will the real appropriation for the market be delayed.

Advertisers and agents tell us many newspapers are willing to do anything for business, from hiring a band to digging a canal; from giving free publicity on the strength of a campaign that may appear some time, to soliciting retailers to get behind a campaign in a magazine for the necessary local advertising to make sales.

If the day ever comes when we can say as an industry that we are not committing commercial murder in the name of co-operation, that our columns are closed to press agentry of all kinds and that our retailers shall not be exploited with our help by advertisers who deal in pure dealer bunk advertising, national advertising in the newspapers will grow by leaps and bounds.

BASEBALL AND FAST NEWS

THE AKRON PRESS at the close of last baseball season sent the following letter to an enquirer about the PONY AUTOPLATE Machine:

THE DAILY HOME NEWS, October 25, 1923
New Brunswick, N. J.

Gentlemen:

I will attempt to answer your letter of October 22nd, relative to Pony Autoplate, in a perfectly fair and honest manner by saying that we have had wonderful results with this machine. We could not ask for better plates than we are getting. So far as speed is concerned, we have very keen competition on our baseball but are able to beat this opposition to the street nine times out of ten. This in spite of the fact that the opposition has patent lockups on their press and we have not. A copy of our paper is being sent to you for your inspection.

Daddy of the Comic Strip Was Discovered by Hearst

"IN THE DAYS OF MY YOUTH"

GENE CARR, who is drawing the new comic strip and Sunday page "The Baxter Beasleys" for the McClure Newspaper Syndicate, New York, is a native New Yorker. He was born and educated there and began his newspaper career on the New York Recorder. An astonishing fact about him is that he has never had any art training. The first sketch he ever had printed appeared in the Recorder on the same day that it lay down and died. This might well have seemed ominous to both Mr. Carr and editors but apparently it did not, for he worked successively for the New York Herald, Philadelphia Times and then back to New York on the Journal and the World. He resigned from the latter newspaper some months ago.

GENE CARR

Carr says he has been discovered by everybody but Dr. Cook, but he himself puts the blame on W. R. Hearst. In the Hearst organization he worked under the direction of Rudolph Block and he says "Block knocked a lot of tricks out of me and knocked a lot of others in."

Gene Carr is the daddy of the comic strip in the East—he drew the first one that appeared in that part of the country, "Lady Bountiful" of popular memory. He also created "Metropolitan Movies" on the last page of the World which George M. Cohan said "always could be relied on to start the day off with a big laugh."

HOW DENMARK SOLVES ITS NEWSPRINT AND DISTRIBUTION PROBLEMS

CO-OPERATION among publishers, both in buying newsprint and in distributing finished newspapers has been brought to a high stage of perfection in Denmark, according to Louis Henius, general manager of the Copenhagen Berlingske Tidende, and president of the Association of Danish Newspapers who has been visiting this country studying American newspaper methods. This co-operation, he points out, is one thing which the United States might learn from publishers of his country.

It was during the war, Henius declared in an interview granted EDITOR & PUBLISHER in New York, that the Danish newspaper publishers first formed an organization for the purpose of co-operative purchasing of paper supplies. Now 250 daily newspapers in Denmark are members, he said.

"We are now able to buy newsprint at 3¼ cents a pound, which, as you can see, is a big saving," the Danish newspaper men stated.

All the newspapers of Denmark are represented on a general board of directors. This board appoints 3 men as an executive committee. The executive committee members are men well versed in newsprint conditions. They make all negotiations with paper companies, and also keep up with the changing newsprint market.

The member newspapers contribute to the support of a main office at which the executive committee makes its head quarters. The cost of keeping up this office, as well as salaries to the executive committee is very small, according to Henius, amounting to only one-tenth of a cent for every pound of paper purchased.

Distribution of newspapers has also been well organized in Danish cities, Henius said. He believes American cities of the same size as Copenhagen, about 750,000 population, might well adopt the same sort of system.

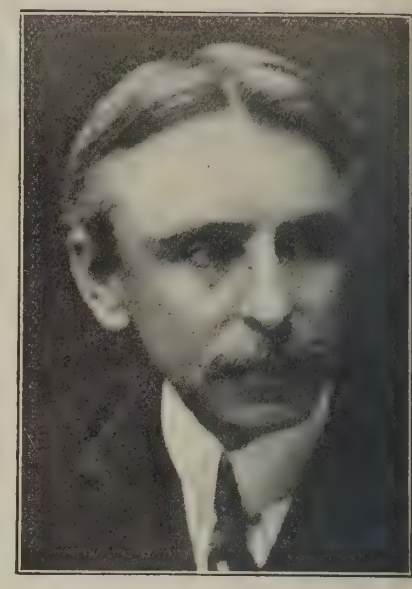
In Copenhagen the 8 daily newspapers banded together and formed a non-profit making stock company to distribute their editions. Nine central stations, as distributing points, have been established in important parts of the cities. Fifteen automobile trucks carry the newspapers from the offices to these points and also to the 4,000 stands in the city. From the 9 central stations, only 400 carriers are needed to carry the newspapers to every home.

All expenses, Henius figures, for carrying newspapers direct from the presses to the homes, amounts to only ½ a cent per copy.

Henius as been in this country during the past 6 weeks. Studying the organization of American newspapers he has visited the New York Times, New York World, and New York Herald Tribune, the Chicago Tribune, the Philadelphia Public Ledger, and the Los Angeles Illustrated News. He remarked on the enormous development evidenced since his last visit to this country 5 years ago.

PLAN FOR GETTING WEDDING NEWS

The Society Editor of the Wausau Daily Record-Herald, of Wausau, Wis., recently evolved an interesting new plan for getting news concerning weddings in the country. She kept track of the marriage licenses and about a week before the scheduled wedding, sent to the bride-elect a blank form, together with an appropriate personal letter.



The returns have been reported as highly satisfactory.

The form used is as follows:

Name of their attendants—where from
What bride wore—dress, veil and flowers
What her attendants wore—dress and flowers

Our Own World of Letters

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

IF "Informing Your Public" by Irving Squire and Kirtland A. Wilson (Associated Press) can be widely and wisely marketed, considerable cussing—not to use the harsher term—of copy by rewrite men may be avoided.

Copy coming from religious, educational, and eleemosynary institutions is without doubt the worst prepared of all material that reaches the city desk.

Most of the men who send out news from these institutions often miss the 'bull's-eye" in the text column simply for lack of information found in this volume. It has, however, been so carefully compiled and edited that certain chapters, especially those dealing with the collection, preparation, and distribution of information, can be read to advantage between editions by the working press.

The chapter, "Illustrations versus photographs," should be marked for special perusal by those connected with the art department. In this chapter will be found valuable suggestions given by such men as Frank A. Eaton, New York Tribune, Raymond H. Torrey, New York Evening Post, and Charles M. Graves, New York Times. A more descriptive title for this chapter would be, "What Gives News Value to a Photograph?"

The blurb on the jacket is taken from the foreword by James Wright Brown, Publisher of EDITOR AND PUBLISHER—described as representative organ of the newspaper world":

To be quite frank, it is the only exposition of those vital, controlling principles that I have ever read with which I find myself in hearty accord, as measuring up somewhat to the ideals of Christian character and conduct which I believe should characterize the intercourse of any great public welfare enterprise with the press and public; ideals equally applicable to any legitimate undertaking.

CHESTER ROWELL, who was at one time editor and publisher of the Republican at Fresno, Cal., is the author of "France, Germany, and the Future" in the New Republic for June 11. He believes that there is no word but critical to describe the situation, but he does admit that it has elements of hope.

CHESTER T. CROWELL, formerly an editorial writer on the New York Evening Post, is the author of "American Journalism Today" in The American Mercury for June. Mr. Crowell is not quite accurate as to the workings of the City News Association of New York City, but he has written an interesting comment about the present day press. Compared with the press of yesterday Mr. Crowell sums up the situation as follows:

It is more useful to the average run of readers than ever before in its history.
It is more accurate.
It is fairer.
It has less imagination, initiative or purpose (barring profit).
It is without equal for honest advertising and is struggling to raise its standard even higher.
It has very little influence and doesn't give a damn.
The quality of its writing grows steadily more sloppy and threatens to reach a point where translation will be necessary.
It is absolutely free of official domination, a fact so generally recognized that no mention would be made of it here except to invite comparison with Europe.
Financial and advertising influence, when exerted upon it at all, usually results in something that is silly rather than sinister.

THE magazine section of the Brooklyn Eagle for June 8 tells the inside story of the purchase of the Kaiser's Memoirs for syndicate publication in American newspapers.

The conclusion of the articles as a good follow-up story:

In Paris the story was turned down flat by the subsidized press. Mr. Brainard called on the editors. He very subtly suggested that the refusal of the French press to publish the statement of the beaten enemy might be excellent reading. And might furnish the beaten enemy with excellent propaganda.
They bought the story.

IT MAY be propaganda, but "The Right Way to Use Newspaper Space," a pamphlet just published by the Bureau of Advertising of the American Newspaper Publishing Association will give advertising managers a lot of ammunition for use in campaigns to get national advertising.

The story that I would mark "First Page, Must" is that which outlines the making of good copy. Another good story is "Elementary Steps to Market."

The pamphlet may be obtained from the American Newspaper Publishers Association, World Building, New York City; Marquette Building, Chicago, Ill.; First National Bank Building, San Francisco, Cal.

John H. Millar, president of Associated Editors, Inc., sailed from Montreal June 19, on the S. S. St. Claire, for a 3 months' tour in Europe. He was accompanied by Mrs. Millar.

Hendrik Van Loon, who will cover the Democratic Convention for the Christy Walsh Syndicate, New York, plans to give a newspaper breakfast at the Harvard Club, Sunday, June 22.

Jesse S. Butcher, formerly of the New York Times, and John Van Bibber, formerly of the New York Herald Tribune, have joined the staff of the D. P. Syndicate, Garden City, N. Y. Ralph Perry, who was with the syndicate until this month, has become assistant editor of a new magazine, the Frontier, which will be published several months hence by Doubleday, Page & Co.

Milt Gross, who draws "Banana Oil," a comic strip, for the New York World Syndicate, has started a contest offering a prize for the best Banana Oil joke. He announces that "Count Screwloose of Toulouse, the noted French caricaturist, is coming to America" to assist him.

Violet Dare, of the Wheeler Syndicate staff, New York, has prepared a series of illustrated pages called "The Beauty Makers." Each one is an interview with a photographer whose skill has established many a woman in a secure position as a beauty. The interviews are illustrated with photographs of famous beauties—actresses, society women, etc., many of whom learned through the photographer's art how beautiful they coulde.

Dr. William T. Ellis, veteran newspaper man, whose weekly article on the International Sunday School Lesson is published in 83 papers, is writing a short daily religious article for the McClure Newspaper Syndicate called "The Quiet Corner."

"Jumping into the Jungle" is the title of a series of stories for children by Grace Bliss Stewart which the Wheeler Syndicate is putting out. They relate the adventures of five fairies in the African jungle.

Joe Jordan, conducting the column "Sought, Seen and Heard" for the New York Evening Post Syndicate, is now writing under the nom de plume, "Mann Hatton." Jordan went to the Post from the New York Evening World, where he had served as reporter for 25 years.

WHAT'S WHAT IN THE FEATURE FIELD

NORMAN H. MOORE, shipping clerk o fthe Ledger Syndicate, Philadelphia, in a letter to the Syndicate Editor, has the following to say about his department:

"Ask any newspaper man what is the most vital spot in any newspaper syndicate, large or small. Nine out of 10 will tell you that the shipping department is and always has been. But not all syndicates realize the need of a well-organized shipping department, where everything is done by system. Syndicate salesmen can get all the orders that it is possible to get, but the syndicate cannot hold them if a subscriber receives poor service through the shipping department.

"When a newspaper orders a service and it arrives only 3 or 4 days ahead of release (which is generally the fault of the shipping department) and it is too late for simultaneous release, the subscribing newspaper naturally wants a cancellation of charge for that release.

"Then an investigation is instituted as to who is responsible for the delay?

"Loose labels or badly addressed packages are too often unjustly blamed on the Post-Office Department, when a careless shipping clerk is the real culprit.

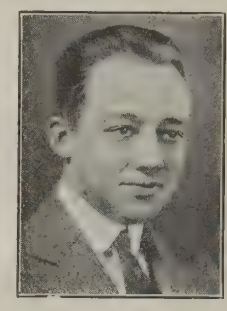
The D. P. Syndicate, Garden City, N. Y., has just announced that it now represents not only Doubleday, Page & Co., but also the following: Dodd, Mead & Co., Harcourt, Brace & Co., Little Brown & Co., and the Frederick A. Stokes Company.



Hodder & Stoughton, Limited, Toronto, Canada, has changed the name of its syndicate service to the Musson Book Company, Limited. This syndicate is just organizing a special women's news service through its special correspondents in the Dominion.

A. Rowden King, formerly associate editor of Printers' Ink, is now writing a series of 6 short articles a month, for King Editors' Features, New York, on retail selling problems entitled "Telling Selling Tips."

U. S. NEWS INTERESTS EUROPEAN PRESS

Continent Now Takes America, "Land of the Dollar" Seriously, Ferguson, United Press Vice-President, Observes on Trip Abroad

Europe is showing an increased interest in American news, according to Fred Ferguson, vice-president of the United Press Associations, who has just returned from a trip abroad, during which he visited London, Paris, Rome, Cologne and Berlin.

FRED FERGUSON

About 50 per cent more news from the United States is being printed abroad now than before the war, he estimated.

"Continental and English newspapers are now taking America seriously," Ferguson declared.

"Whereas in the old days before the war, the only correspondence from the United States that hit page one abroad was the freak feature or sensational crime story, today American business and political news is being eagerly read by the masses.

"This increase in the transmission of American news abroad," he continued, "is proportionately far greater than the increase in foreign news sent to this country."

This change is because America is now recognized as the great business power of the world, Ferguson believes.

"Where they used to talk of the English pound, Europeans are now discussing the American dollar," he said.

Ferguson also noted a change in the handling of domestic news in European countries using less propaganda.

Lower Cost per Sale

Cost per sale made is the true cost of advertising space.

And lower cost per sale is the reason why so many Cleveland retail merchants prefer to use THE NEWS advertising columns to sell their merchandise.

The advertising figures of the past month, compared with the same period a year ago, show the gain made by THE NEWS in local display advertising.

May, 1924 vs. 1923

THE NEWS GAIN . . .	214 COLUMNS
THE PRESS GAIN	41 COLUMNS
THE PLAIN DEALER LOSS .	19 COLUMNS

Note, that during this period THE NEWS gained MORE THAN FIVE TIMES as much advertising space as any other Cleveland morning or evening paper.

The gains and losses in local Display Advertising of Cleveland's Daily Newspapers for the first five months of 1924 as compared with the same period of 1923 are also interesting.

Here are the figures:

January to May, Inclusive, 1924 vs. 1923

NEWS GAIN	641 COLUMNS
PRESS GAIN	295 COLUMNS
PLAIN DEALER LOSS . .	48 COLUMNS

If Cleveland merchants sell your goods why not advertise in the newspaper that sells their goods?

London Office—Hastings House, 10, Norfolk Street, Strand, W. C. 2

Thirty Club Dinner to Clynes:—J. R. Clynes, M. P., Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons, was the guest at the Thirty Club dinner, May 30. He expressed his own admiration for the work of the Convention and stated that the Government (in office but not in power, as he expressed it) was very interested in the movement. He hoped that it would be possible for the Prime Minister to attend at least one of the sessions. On June 24, the Thirty Club will welcome Harry Tipper and Earle Pearson on their arrival.

Glasgow's Missionary Returns:—Sir Robert Wilson, of the Glasgow Publicity Club, has just returned from a visit to the United States and Canada. Although the visit was purely one of pleasure, Sir Robert Wilson's presence in various cities became known, and he was invited to address gatherings of Advertising Clubs there on the forthcoming delegation visit to London and Glasgow and elsewhere. Sir Robert is delighted with this totally unexpected result of his visit—and so is Glasgow.

Sweden Comes In:—C. Thompson Walker, of the D. J. Keymer Advertising Agency, who is in Sweden, has just informed London headquarters that Swedish advertising men are enthusiastic for the Convention and at least 30 delegates will come over.

The Swenska Reklamforbundet—the Publicity Club of Sweden—and the Swedish Newspaper Dagens Nyheter are jointly organizing a delegation of advertising and selling men for London. The delegation will arrive in London the 11th of July, and the first few days will study Anglo-Swedish trade relations.

Four Australasian Delegates Coming:—Four delegates from the Advertising Association of Australia and New Zealand are due to arrive in London at the beginning of July. The leader of the delegation is C. H. Jones of the Melbourne Argus and he is accompanied by Mr. Clarke of Tasmania, H. E. Poole and Mr. Wilkinson of the Victorian Institution of Advertising Men. Mr. Jones will take up the subject of the formation of British Empire Association with the leading advertising men in this country when he arrives. John Paton of the Paton Advertising Agency was the only Australian delegate to Atlantic City last year, so that London feels specially honored.

More Post-Convention Trips:—T. B. Lawrence, chairman of the National Sight-Seeing Committee, has received from Norwich the program for the week-end (July 19-20) which the Delegates are to spend in that city. The party will arrive on Saturday for lunch and met by the Norwich Publicity Committee go for a short drive round the city. They will be accorded a Civic Welcome and go on to Carrow Abbey, the home of the Lord Mayor, where there will be a reception. In the evening there will be a banquet. There will be an excursion to the Broads. The Stranger's Hall, a mediaeval mansion and folk museum, will be opened for delegates. In the Hall there are rooms representing every period of the domestic history of the city from 1400 to the present time.

The Bristol Reception Committee have now issued their program. The delegates will arrive from Torquay on Wednesday morning, July 23, and will be entertained to an informal lunch. After a drive round the city they will visit Avonmouth Docks. In the evening there will be a dinner and an official reception by the Lord Mayor. On Thursday the delegates will visit various local industries and drive through the beautiful Chedder Gorge. This will be followed by a banquet. On Friday they will visit the ancient city of Bath.

With the Publicity Clubs:—Holbrook Jackson, a director of the National Trade Press, entertained members of the Manchester Publicity Club on May 27, with an address on "Agoraphobia, or Fear of Space in Relation to Publicity"

At the Bradford Publicity Club, May 23, W. H. Harford, a director of Saward Baker & Co. Ltd., addressed the members on the subject of "After Wembley—What?" It was a reference to the British Empire Exhibition, not the Advertising Convention.

Sir Harold MacKintosh, head of the famous toffee firm was the speaker at a meeting of the Leeds Publicity Club, held at the Hotel Metropole, Leeds, May 23. Sir Harold declared that advertising reduced selling costs. In his own business the selling costs were less today when their advertising costs ran into six figures, than 20 years ago when the advertising costs were only a few pounds and they relied on travelers. Advertising worked all weathers, never got into the dumps, and never left to go over to a competitor.

Birmingham is the latest city to form a Publicity Club, the decision being given at a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce. It is the result of a movement originated by H. Cecil Taylor, the well known advertising agent of that city. Cecil Taylor presided and a deputation from the club is approaching the Lord Mayor of Birmingham to enlist his interest in the idea of a reception to visiting Convention delegates.

W. H. Burchall (Caxton Press), has presented a silver cup to the Regent Advertising Club of London for annual competition among its members.

Former N. Y. News Men Promoted

E. C. Hill, for many years a reporter for the New York Sun and the New York Herald, has been promoted to an executive position on the production staff of the Fox Film Corporation. He left the newspaper field less than 2 years ago to become director of Fox News. Truman H. Talley, who went to the Fox Company from the New York Times more than a year ago, has been made editor of Fox News. Talley formerly was London correspondent for the New York Herald and previously was night editor of that newspaper.

Surveys Spokane Market

The Spokesman-Review and Chronicle of Spokane, Wash., have just issued the 1924 edition of "Mercantile Trade Conditions in the Spokane Country," a 32-page booklet devoted to analysis of the territorial market. Its pages of statistics are well set off by half-tone illustrations, color drawings, and special maps. The booklet is tabbed for inclusion in a regular data or letter file.

Publication Changes Name

E. T. Meredith, publisher of Fruit, Garden and Home, a monthly magazine published in Des Moines, Ia., announces that effective with the August issue the name will be changed to Better Homes and Gardens.

AIM AT THE HEART OF BIG BUSINESS IN

West Virginia

When we say "aim at the heart of big business" we mean the big centers of a small State, where retailers and the general public are most anxious to secure everything that is up-to-date for the home and personal use.

It is only through close personal inspection of any territory that the national advertiser can expect to realize the possibilities of every field in which he markets his products.

Such close inspection reveals the fact that West Virginia, mile for mile, compares favorably with any locality in wealth, purchasing power and resources.

Space will not permit a complete analysis of West Virginia markets, but each of the following newspapers will gladly furnish you facts and figures regarding their individual territories and the State as a whole.

The cities represented in this list are the principal marketing and distribution points of the State.

These newspapers promise co-operation with your sales promotion department.

It is time to "aim at the heart of big business" and learn how large this little State has become.

Backward nations of the world, peoples not free, governments not serving the common needs of those who live under their laws, undeveloped, defeated, hopelessly yearning congeries in lands where access to the sources of information and wisdom is still to this day denied, are to find ultimate emancipation when they charter a free press. Unless you believe this, hold to it, proclaim it, your vessel is empty and your mission futile.

The pillars of strength that the men who are to meet at Wembley have laid under the free press structure form a foundation which shall endure through the ages. Advertising of legitimate trade, under the slogan "Truth," is the red blood in the veins of our modern commercial body. It is the clearing house of the ideas of industry and commerce, associating those who desire and need to trade, creating a demand for and supplying modern means of life, comfort, luxury and such happiness as may be found in material things. Where its function is honestly and intelligently exercised, modern advertising has established itself as a scientific, economic force second to none in public usefulness.

The cheap retail price of newspapers is made possible by revenues from advertising; making information accessible to the rank and file of society on even terms and without excepting any class, however lowly. In this sense advertising is a basic factor in the democracy and circulating efficiency of the press.

As advertising supplies to the press its economic freedom, it makes possible its editorial freedom, and by these means the centuries-old yoke of control of the printed word has been loosed, with beneficent results widely in evidence.

It is axiomatic that nations are free just in proportion to the freedom of their press. The advertising forces meeting at Wembley are high commissioners of unfettered journalism.

Such is a snap-shot of our vision of abstract benefits to be derived from the convention and such is the basis of EDITOR & PUBLISHER's lively interest in and service to this notable event.

Why not a conference, now, of the High Collars and Spats, to form an international agreement for humane war, which is a way of saying death by good, old, reliable and slow means, counting victims one by one. "Death-ray," aerial gas bombs, long-range guns and such new-fangled notions threaten the cherished sport of nations. War is becoming rough.

advertisers and to make investigations which may be general in scope and applicable to many accounts, but to insist that the identity of the proposed advertiser be made known before reporting information compiled on a specific line.

"THIRD—To endeavor to educate the dealer in better merchandising methods and to insist that advertised goods be furnished customers rather than 'just as good' substitute.

"FOURTH—To encourage adequate merchandising by supplying data maps, route lists to the trade for the use of salesmen of the manufacturer or advertiser who has made a bona fide contract for advertising space.

"FIFTH—To decline requests for service that are clearly not within the province of newspaper, such as selling goods or other canvassing, or the payment of bills for printing, and postage of letters, broadsides, etc."

Imagine the business acumen behind an advertising car card, costing $10 per month per car, which reads: "Watch the newspapers for our latest offerings in high-grade bonds."

people of Pottsville have thoroughly understood and appreciated his long, patient fight, for the Zerbey newspapers have prospered and we know of few instances where the people of a community are more devoted in their affection to a local editor or publisher.

It is one thing to fight for "over yonder" reforms, speaking in generalities and softly threading your way to avoid controversy, and it is something else to fight in season and out for more than a score of years, in a small town, in plain terms, to compel local financial powers to deal justly and democratically with a local government which concerns not the individual comfort and the happiness of the owners or directors of those corporations but is the ground-work of profit-making machines.

Mr. Zerbey is now 67 years of age. He is not a "radical" in politics and is not "against" any man because he is wealthy or any corporation because it is large. He simply knows the difference between right and wrong, and at that line he fights whoever may be concerned. As Mr. Leary, our correspondent, remarked, he is proof that the race of fighting editors still lives.

Editorial by "Spectator" in New York American says, "A man that cannot save on one thousand a year cannot save on ten thousand," which is another reason why editorial pages are losing interest.

FULL INFORMATION

SOMEONE with nothing better to say at the moment, recently criticized the press for its physical size, its volume of news material and deplored modern mass circulation methods.

Last week there was a national political convention at Cleveland. Literally millions of words were telegraphed from the convention hall, so that the people of the United States might possess the facts. We happen to know that one newspaper, the New York Times, received from Cleveland, over its own special wires, in addition to copy laid down by the Associated Press, 235,000 telegraphed words.

Is it a good thing or a bad thing for the people to receive complete reports of a political convention? Is it a good thing or a bad thing for those who make public opinion, to have the facts upon which to base a voter's judgment?

If the people of this country do not understand the issues of the campaign as they were laid down at Cleveland, it is not the fault of the newspaper press.

FOLKS WORTH KNOWING

MAJOR JOHN S. COHEN, president and editor of the Atlanta (Ga.) Journal who was awarded an honorary LL. D. degree June 10, by Washington and Lee University, has had a varied career as newspaper reporter, Washington correspondent, and editor.

JOHN S. COHEN

Major Cohen was born in 1870, at Augusta, Ga., the son of Phillip Lawrence Cohen who entered the army at 16 years of age and surrendered with Lee at Appomattic.

In 1890, he became identified with the newspaper of which he is now president and editor. On the day the Spanish-American war was declared, Major Cohen sailed with the American fleet, under Admiral Bob Evans. He witnessed the first capture of enemy ships, wrote many news stories and on the call for volunteers returned to Georgia, where he was commissioned first lieutenant in the Third Georgia Volunteer Infantry. He was promoted to the rank of major and served in the army of occupation in Cuba at the conclusion of the war.

ASSOCIATION CHIEFS

IN telling the newspaper history of John L. Stewart, who, a short while ago, was re-elected president of the Pennsylvania Associated Dailies to serve a second term, one would, possessed with Tarkington technique, dwelling longest perhaps on those days when at "Seventeen" he started as reporter for the Uniontown (Pa.) Standard. Then he wrote copy and attended to studies, preparing for college at the Redstone Academy in Uniontown.

Even during college days, he continued newspaper work, serving on the staff of the Washington (Pa.) Observer, when he was at Washington and Jefferson, where he received his A. B. degree in 1899. At the same time he built up a very extensive outside correspondence with eastern newspapers, which he continued for a year after he was graduated. During 1900 and 1902 he studied at Harvard Law School. Legal text books, impressive as they are, failed to push aside printers' ink and he persisted in newspaper work during vacation.

On July 1, 1902, the opportunity came to him to purchase the Washington Observier and on July 24, the property came under his control, although he only had a minority interest. On Jan. 1, 1923, he purchased for the same syndicate the Washington Reporter and became general manager for both newspapers, which were later moved to one building and conducted as morning and evening publications.

In 1912, Stewart purchased the large majority of the stock of the corporation owning the two newspapers. In 1911, he had purchased the Beaver (Pa.) Times and on Feb. 1, 1921, he bought the Beaver Falls Tribune. The four newspapers which make up the Stewart group have a total circulation of nearly 30,000. Last June, the Reporter and Observer were moved into a new home costing in the neighborhood of $200,000.

W. M. McINTOSH

McIntosh established the Press, an afternoon newspaper, Oct. 3, 1921.

Postal Strike Threat

A threat to strike was sent to the Canadian government and Parliament this week by executives of the Canadian Federation of Postal Employes, as a result of a recent wage controversy. The threat was contained in a resolution calling upon Parliament in Ottawa to amend the postal laws so that the government itself would be able to deal with the demands of postal employes.

Church Advertising at London Convention

British papers have not yet developed the field of church advertising as have the papers of America.

The Church Advertising Department of the A.A.C.W. will be amply represented at the London Convention together with an exhibit showing some of the things churches on this side of the water are doing to reach prospective attendants through the daily press.

Newspapers have had a large part in developing church advertising, and the Church Advertising Department through the hearty cooperation of Editor and Publisher has been able to have a share also in this work.

Copy for newspaper display advertising for all the churches in a town may be obtained from E. H. Harris, Richmond Palladium, Richmond, Ind., or Herbert H. Smith, Witherspoon Building, Philadelphia, Pa.

THIS MESSAGE OF

THE A. B. C.

TO THE LONDON CONVENTION

The Audit Bureau of Circulations of the United States and Canada extends to the annual convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, to be held in London, July 13th to 18th, 1924, its hearty felicitations.

If the conference between the British delegates and the delegates interested in circulation from the United States and Canada result in a desire for further action on the part of the British publisher, advertisers and advertising agents, the Bureau assures its British brethren of full co-operation.

We are yours to command in the establishment of the net paid circulation basis in the purchase and sale of advertising space, not only in the British Isles but throughout the civilized world.

DOLLAR PULLERS

Advertising and circulation managers are always on the lookout for new ideas that will increase advertising receipts and win new circulation. Your idea for increasing advertising or circulation may not appeal to your manager, but it may be just the thing that some other manager wants. EDITOR & PUBLISHER will pay $1 for each idea printed under this head. The fact that the idea is now being used in your city does not bar it from the department. Address your communication to the DOLLAR PULLER EDITOR. When they appear clip them and mail them in and receive payment. Unavailable ideas will not be returned.

GROWING steadily, the "Home Beautiful" of a Washington, D. C., paper once a week, now has four and more pages under this legend, covering everything of interest pertaining to home and garden, such as articles on materials of the house, care, and lighting. All the local merchants, furniture, paint men, etc., who have anything to do with a home are eligible for advertising under this banner, and many take advantage of the four and more pages devoted to this broad subject.—C. M. LITTLEJOHN, Washingtan, D. C.

"When the Prodigal Returns" could be worked into an interesting idea that would instantly appeal to every service station in your city. Lay out your page with the heading suggested. The following heads would be suitable for the individual ads: There's A Welcome Awaiting That Old Boat, No Matter If It Was Not Bought From the Local Agent, Bring It In Just the Same," and "Back To Its Old Home." An advertising man with plenty of imagination and this thought in view could get local Service Stations to run co-operative ad campaigns destined to bring in more work and put them on a profit-paying basis. Work out this idea in detail and put your auto ad-man on the trail.—GEORGE C. MARCLEY, Ogdensburg, N. Y.

A means of increasing advertising revenue would be to arrange one or two special pages, to contain one column of news and advice concerning local dogs, and the balance, advertising from dealers in dog remedies, dog collars, chains, robes, etc. Most of the dealers in these canine necessities would be willing to buy space in the page or pages, because of the special appeal that would be directed at the owners of dogs. Very few direct appeals have been made to dog owners, this field having been more or less overlooked.—W. MCNULTY, St. John, Can.

Pictures are always of tremendous interest to folks. So why not get up a picture page, or spread for advertisers, in which only pictures would be accepted as advertising? On this page the stores could present pictures of show windows, pictures of interesting places about their stores, etc. Of course, a little explanatory copy could be used. It would be an easy matter to make this page particularly interesting and particularly helpful to the stores in getting attention and building business.—FRANK H. WILLIAMS, Ft. Wayne, Ind.

No matter where located, your journal is the best medium for your section for carrying ads of seaside and mountain resorts and steamship lines. Are you getting your share of these ads to be run under "Hotels, Resorts and Travel." This field can be cultivated both summer and winter, inasmuch as winter resorts advertise as extensively as those operated only in the summer—C. M. LITTLEJOHN, Washington, D. C.

Hoover says, "Buy Coal Now" made a dandy page for us, spacing the page into eight equal spaces for coal dealers. The coal dealers liked it fine and helped us get extra inches for our daily and weekly. On all special pages like this we sell for both our papers.—R KENNETH KERR, Wilmington, (O.) News.

A Boston newspaper capitalized to the extent of a peg on the fact that the proceedings at the Republican convention were to be broadcast by radio. Pictures of especial interest at the moment were included in the upper layout, calling attention to the possibilities of hearing every speech and cheer at the Cleveland gathering—while below were published long lists of names of dealers in radio outfits and supplies and specialists in installation with the information that "these can serve you if your home is not already equipped with a radio set," etc. This idea might be worked satisfactorily in the so-called convention cities where the proceedings of business bodies and educational associations are put on the air, and the slight individual cost to each dealer whose name is printed should commend it alike for its economy and its prominence of display.—K. H. W., Boston, Mass.

F. B. Christy, Cadiz, O., agent for the Cleveland Plain Dealer, has demonstrated the pulling power of well written letters, with a personal note and smile in them, in collecting overdue accounts, and W. L. Chorpening, country circulation manager of the P. D. is inclined to think other agents might follow Christy's plan with success.

Do you remember how, when you were young and your good folks sent you down town after something, they were very likely to tie a string about your thumb to make certain you would not forget?

Those were the happy days, were they not?

But—there's no reason why the days of NOW should not be as happy, and it is just as certain that some of us are liable to forget the little things of today.

Because of that, we are sending you this little reminder—NOT TO FORGET TO PAY—the inclosed statement.

We hope we may have the pleasure of hearing from you promptly.

Sincerely yours,
F. B. CHRISTY, Prop.,
City News Stand.

If this does not bring settlement a second letter, one that is almost sure fire, follows in this tone:

TIE THE STRING AND YOU WON'T FORGET

Willie's mother had just given her little boy a lecture and told him that his every act was known to God—that God's eye followed him wherever he went.

Willie went down the street ashamed of himself and his faithful Fido followed close behind. In a few monutes Willie turned into a lane, saw the dog, and then delivered himself of—"Aw, go on home and quit follerin' me around. Ain't it enuff to have God wid me all the time without you taggin' on behind?

Now, we do not wish to be taggin' on behind. We do not want to annoy or bother you one bit—but—we do want to remind you that we have sent you, already, one copy of the inclosed statement and we would be pleased to have your prompt settlementt.

When will you obilge us?

Earnestly yours,
F. B. CHRISTY, Prop.,
City News Stand.

Yes, that's a piece of the same string we sent you with the other letter. It will prevent you forgetting this time.—J. H. WEBB, Cleveland, O.

Mrs. Brant Thanks the Press

IOWA CITY, Ia.

TO EDITOR & PUBLISHER:—May I express our thanks to the newspaper fraternity in general for its generous response to our appeal for aid in the quest for Archer W. Brant of Iowa City, Ia., who disappeared from his home, a victim of amnesia, his whereabouts being unknown for about ten months. A message to his family from the Cleveland (O.) Press, announcing his discovery, immediately followed the publication of the notice and his picture in the Chicago Tribune and to these papers we are especially grateful for their prompt and efficient aid.

Though a nation-wide search had been conducted through the usual channels, it remained for the newspapers to produce results in less than a week where police and detectives had failed for nearly a year.

We also thank EDITOR & PUBLISHER for the use of their INTERNATIONAL YEAR BOOK for the compilation of the newspaper list.

JAPAN HAS "COME BACK"

The Earthquake Scars Are Healing

Are You Overlooking the New Japanese Market?

A bird's-eye view of the new Tokyo, which has risen heroically from the ashes. The photographer stood on Kudan Hill, looking out over the Kanda district which was swept by fire September 1.

Those who predicted the result of the earthquake would be the destruction of the Japanese market for foreign goods have been proved wrong. Economy, it is true, has been made necessary in our country, which was sorely tried by Nature's great upheaval last September. But the Japanese have always been economical.

And economy does not necessarily mean the cessation of purchasing goods abroad. It means merely that we must exercise the greatest caution in order to see that only the best is imported. That, in the long run, is the truest economy.

Foreign Manufacturers who are able to give value in merchandise will not be disappointed by the results of intelligent sales efforts in Japan today. It is necessary only that the market be approached judiciously.

Certainly, no sales manager would consider entering the Japan field without calling on the Hochi Shimbun for the assistance it is able and very glad to afford. Before you go further with your sales program in Japan, get in touch with our New York representative, Mr. J. P. Barry, who will be glad to be of all possible assistance to you.

IMAGINATION, VISION, COURAGE NEEDED IN BUILDING CLASSIFIED COLUMNS

Censorship of Copy Necessary, New York Times Manager Declares—Describes His Paper's Method of Increasing Lineage

By W. W. MILLER

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING MANAGER, NEW YORK TIMES

IMAGINATION, vision and courage are essential in building classified columns. No royal highway leads to success. There is no magic formula to attract advertisers. Each newspaper has its own difficulties and peculiar problems, local conditions, and office policies. Increased lineage is acquired by degrees and not by radical changes or sensational promotion schemes.

It has been said that substantially all classified advertising appearing in the New York Times comes without solicitation. This is a bold and unusual statement. Nevertheless it is largely true. It must be considered that from 55 to 60 per cent of classified advertising in the Times comes from advertising agents and much of this is solicited business.

Every newspaper, large or small, even in times when it is obliged to omit advertising, wants more classified—and like Oliver Twist asks for more and more and then some. Most newspapers excel in certain classifications and require stimulation in others. The Times possibly prints more spontaneous advertising than any other publication in the country, yet it also has certain classifications that carry 80 per cent direct solicited advertising. Leadership creates added responsibilities in a successful classified advertising department. Competition is extremely keen, even if it isn't always sane.

The New York Times today is more wide-awake to the possibilities in classified advertising than in any other period of its phenomenal growth.

Two weeks ago our Classified Department was moved into larger quarters. It is now equipped with a new telephone system and a sound proof room for the handling of voluntary and solicited advertisements.

All advertisements offered the Times are subject to censorship and those regarded as objectionable and unworthy are declined. It takes courage to reject advertising and tact and super-salesmanship to get revision in advertising copy. This care exercised for the protection of our readers gives them confidence.

To get more classified advertisements for your readers, keep your advertising columns clean. Thousands of dollars are spent and wasted in advertising columns of newspapers annually by advertisers who insist on "bulldozing" the public through absurd and exaggerated statements. The sooner the newspapers standardize their regulations as to the acceptability of classified advertising, the sooner will they get more advertising for their readers.

The news columns of any newspaper are reflected in its advertising columns. The wholesome and careful selection of news has been an indirect but important factor in getting more classified advertisements for our readers.

Classified advertising is now getting back to normal. During the war and directly after it, "want" advertising, as you know, experienced an unnatural growth. Regular advertisers are now using better judgment in making their appropriations.

Many classified experts advocate full scription in classified advertising. This works well when the rate per line averages 18 cents. But when the advertising rates of a newspaper range from 50 cents to $1. per line an advertising man is obliged to do some juggling of words. Brevity is the soul of wit and also the soul of advertising. It is not the business of a Classified Advertising Department to curtail advertising expenditures. It can, however, promote good will and develop steady advertisers by showing the way towards saneness and economy in the preparation of copy.

I recall the case of Mary Beaton, a teacher of swimming, now successful in New York. Miss Beaton, a Scotch woman, arrived with little money, no clientele but perseverance, ability and a bag full of credentials. We crowded as much information as we possibly could in a 5-line advertisement. Today, Miss Beaton is using 2-inch display advertisements. Had she started with a two inch display advertisement, possibly today she would be using 5-line ads. In those early advertisements, she advertised no more than she could offer and her readers had confidence in her because of her truthfulness.

Some months ago we excluded all Help Wanted advertisements of unfermented grape juice concerns. There was great competition in this new business—the advertising copy was subject to extreme censorship. Each company endeavored to exploit its product in its Help Wanted advertising. We now accept the advertising with the exploitation omitted. One of these advertisers recently said, "This censorship of advertising has been a revelation to me. I didn't realize we wasted so much money in advertising."

The New York Times has the happy faculty of bringing results. An average of 30,000 replies are received at the Times Square Office every Monday in answer to box number advertisements appearing in the Sunday edition. When we hand out a bundle of replies we have completely sold our service and have developed another voluntary advertiser.

To get more advertisements for your readers, no opportunity should be lost to advise, encourage and assist in every way the new advertiser. The personal attitude of Want Department employees is a big feature in building classified columns and the opportunities for service are unlimited. Meeting, handling and pleasing people is the work of a classified department. It often deals directly with the person who knows little about advertising—to advertise is probably an event. We are especially training all classified employees and counter clerks in the proper handling of Want advertising. Classes and informal talks are held weekly. We are endeavoring to develop that "willingness to serve attitude" and to cultivate the voice with a smile.

COAST STATES LEAD IN DAILY READERS

Newspaper and Magazine Consumption Highest in Proportion to Population Professor's Survey, Based On Editor & Publisher, Shows

The Pacific States are far in advance of the national average in percentage of inhabitants who read daily newspapers and magazines, according to deductions made by Professor George S. Turnbull of the School of Journalism, University of Oregon.

Professor Turnbull based his investigation on the latest statistics given in the INTERNATIONAL YEAR BOOK OF EDITOR & PUBLISHER. Only four states rank above Oregon in percentage of newspaper-reading—Massachusetts, California, New York (51.5 per cent), Missouri (47 per cent). Oregon's percentage is 42.

The New England states and New York-New Jersey are the only groups to surpass the Pacific Coast in percentage of newspaper readers, and in magazine-reading the Pacific Coast group stands first in the United States.

Oregon distances its northern and eastern neighbors in newspaper circulation. Washington has 1,356,621 persons within its borders, according to the 1920 census, and a daily newspaper circulation of 494,000, or 36 per cent of the population figure. Oregon's showing of 327,940 copies circulated among 783,389 population, is 42 per cent, or 6 per cent better than that of Washington.

Idaho, with approximately 50,000 copies of daily newspapers circulating among 431,856, makes approximately one-third as favorable a showing as does Oregon. Only one state, California, of the 10 included in the western group—California, Washington, Colorado, Oregon, Montana, Utah, Idaho, Arizona, Wyoming and Nevada—surpasses Oregon's record in daily newspaper reading. And California is second in the nation, headed only by Massachusetts, which steps far in advance of every other New England state. California's showing is 1,860,000 daily papers read among a population of 3,426,816, or approximately 53 per cent. Massachusetts, home of Harvard University surpasses this record by 1 per cent.

The statistics indicate that Oregon's magazine-reading is far in advance of the average of the United States as a whole. This state, with its 783,389 population (1920 census), includes within its borders 74/100 of 1 per cent of the population. These Oregonians, however, read an average of close to 1.4 per cent of the number of copies of magazines circulated in the country—or nearly twice the total for the nation at large.

Oregon people constituted nine-tenths of 1 per cent of the readers of morning papers in this country, and 1.10 per cent of the readers of evening newspapers. The population of the United States as given in the census of 1920 was 105,710,620. Of these, 11,475,051 read the morning daily papers, and 19,978,632 the evening papers. Sunday papers are listed separately. Total of morning and evening papers circulated in the nation is, on this basis, 31,453,673—a figure which is approximately 30 per cent of the population. Oregon, on the other hand, with its 783,389 population, circulated 105,930 morning papers on week-days and 222,010 afternoon publications. This total of 327,940 represents 42 per cent of the state's population, or 12 per cent in advance of the national average.

In comparison with states of nearly equal population, Oregon's showing is most favorable. Maine, with 98 per cent of Oregon's population, reads 163,810 copies of daily newspapers, or only 50 per cent of Oregon's total. The states of New Hampshire and Vermont, with a combined population a trifle larger than that of Oregon, circulate approximately 115,000 copies of daily newspapers, or less than 40 per cent of Oregon's total.

California to Lure Tourists

Californians, Inc., is to launch an advertising campaign in 60 metropolitan newspapers in the United States to bring to San Francisco and California summer and fall tourists. The organization expects to induce 350,000 persons to visit the state by means of this advertising.

HUNCHES

Managing editors and city editors are always on the lookout for news and feature ideas that can be used locally. Editor & Publisher will pay $1 for each hunch published under this head. The fact that the hunch is now being worked successfully in your city does not bar it from this department. Address your contributions to the Hunch Editor. When they appear, clip them and mail them in and receive payment. Unavailable hunches will not be returned.

WHERE has your state planted its trout? The season is on in many sections. Don't overlook the possibilities of fish-stories.—James M. Mosely, Boston, Mass.

Everyone who reads your paper uses the post office but probably not one per cent understands the various processes that a letter must go through from the time that it is dropped in a green box in the neighborhood until it is delivered to its address. The postmaster will be glad to give you this feature because it will do away with much of the anger aroused when the mail is late.—Max Hahn, Toledo (O.) Blade.

Where to go for the summer vacation is always a problem for the city dweller. Ask your readers for actual itineraries and expense lists of the best vacation trips they have taken. Names of hotels need not be mentioned but the actual cost of room, board, railroad fare or gasoline should be required.—W. B. Norris, Wardour, Annapolis, Maryland.

To check the tendency of young reporters and feature writers to over-write their stuff and pay too little attention to detail, the plan adopted by the Akron Press might help. That is to have a girl send to each person whose name appears in the paper a clipping of the story with a request that the person addressed notify the paper if names, addresses or facts are wrong.

This has reduced inaccuracy to a minimum and has made good will and character for the paper.—Harold Keats, Washington, D. C.

The Boston Transcript is receiving favorable comment on its feature "Washington Today" in which a summary, not a skeleton of the news of Washington including congressional activities, movements of the president and important political and national issue declarations are served to the extent of about a column. This feature can be utilized with profit by nearly any newspaper which has a wire service and appeals because it affords the business man who has not the time to wade through all the Washington dispatches an opportunity to get a grasp of all the developments at the Capitol in a comparatively short space of time. Give the Washington dispatches to one man, let him pick the meat out of them and run the column under a standing head.—James H. Guilfoyle, Worcester, Mass.

When the Fort Wayne (Ind.) Journal-Gazette sends out letters asking for renewals of mail subscriptions it sends along a card giving the prices for daily only and daily and Sunday and also carrying space for the writing of several names and addresses. On one side of the card is the price within a radius of 150 miles of Fort Wayne and on the other side is the subscription price beyond 150 miles. So the whole thing is on one card, which saves a lot of effort in sending the right price list to people at different distances.—Frank H. Williams, Fort Wayne, Ind.

The Boston Herald tried out a stunt recently which, in the opinion of its readers, made a unique news story and stirred interest all over New England. The idea is perfectly applicable anywhere, although in the Herald's case, the merits of the Coolidge veto of the bonus bill and the Lodge vote in the Senate to override it was the issue involved. Readers were asked to indicate their beliefs as to which was right, and the names and addresses of those acceding to the paper's request, made editorially were printed in parallel columns under captions reading "We Believe Coolidge Is Right" and "We Believe Lodge Is Right."

So great was the reader-interest, and so heavy was deluge of names that space to print them all could not be found, although columns of them appeared for several days. The same thing might be tried out with especially good results, Boston newspapermen believe, to obtain an unofficial referendum that would be an accurate gauge of public sentiment on troublesome local issues.—K. H. W., Boston, Mass.

DANA WAS RIGHT

IN the issue of the Chicago Tribune of June 10, buried under a sub head on an inside page, appeared a story that Thomas Lynch, 841 Harvey avenue, Oak Park, Ill., was arrested for biting a dog during an argument. He was fined $1 and costs in the Cicero police court after explaining to the judge that he was full of moonshine when he made the attack.

In the city room of the Detroit News an editor discovered the story and pasted it on the bulletin board with the following comment:

"Well, IT FINALLY HAPPENED."

Flat Rate Best for National

To Editor & Publisher: In your issue for May 31, Ralph R. Mulligan makes a plea for "sliding scale" of advertising rates, believing there would be "less fluctuation in volume of business" with an arrangement of stated days of insertion and in fixed space. My own experience in the "sliding scale" has been that it created suspicion in the minds of the advertising agency that his client (emphasize the words His Client, i. e., the advertiser) might not get the lowest rate without a whole lot of correspondence. A flat rate with no deviation cuts out useless correspondence and makes for satisfactory dealing with the advertising agencies, which represent the advertiser and not the publisher.

We believe fully in the sliding scale for "home consumption"; and have rates for fixed space and also for bulk or open space, the former getting a lower rate than the open space contracts.

MARSHALL INCREASES HIS WEEKLY CHAIN

Young Illinois Publisher Buys Pittman Group—Now Operates 20 Newspapers Under Local Manager Plan

Chicago, Ill., June 15.—With the purchase of the Pittman chain of newspapers, Irl H. Marshall of Chicago, publisher and general manager of Affiliated Newspapers, now operates a string of 20 strong Illinois weeklies.

Irl H. Marshall

Marshall, who in addition to his activities in the publishing field, is an executive of the Gundlach Advertising Company, Chicago, and president of the National Newspaper Bureau, has worked out a unique method in the conduct of his newspapers. The managers of the newspapers are partners and co-publishers, and take complete responsibility for their publications. They also have leeway in controlling the policies of their papers, although the purchasing of print paper and a few other items is done through the general offices of the Affiliated Newspapers in the Bedford Building, Chicago.

The plants of the newspapers are equipped for commercial printing, a phase conducted by the individual managers, who select their own employes. Each paper is conducted in a manner to best serve the community in which it is published.

Mr. Marshall began his newspaper activities as correspondent for the Des Moines (Ia.) Register and Tribune. He published the Morning Sun, college paper, while attending the University of Iowa, Iowa City. He started his chain of newspapers while still in college.

He is active in newspaper circles, holding among other positions those of second vice-president, Illinois Press Association, president Bureau County Press Association, secretary La Salle County Press Association, and is a member of the advertising committee of the National Editorial Association. He is also a member of the Sigma Delta Chi, national honorary journalistic fraternity.

P. C. MacFarlane a Suicide

Peter Clark MacFarlane, 53, nationally known author, committed suicide by shooting himself near the doorway of the morgue in San Francisco in the early evening hours June 9. The spectre of "slipping" mentally induced the act. He left a letter hoping for the kind thoughts of old friends.

Are You On to the On-To-Britain Proposition?

AS soon as you land in the old country you will realise that Billposting is a big element in British advertising and that Billposting in Britain sooner or later means Walter Hill & Co., Limited—"eventually, why not now?"

For instance, the British Empire Exhibition, that fair-sized city at Wembley, just outside London, where the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World holds its Convention, had to be advertised, and "advertised big." Of course, the appropriation included a nation-wide Poster Campaign. Equally, of course, Walter Hill & Co. Limited, handled the whole contract. Throughout the business part of the Exhibition — everywhere but in the Amusement Park—Walter Hill & Co. Limited are sole concessionaires for Poster Advertising.

Delegates will be welcome at the Headquarters of British Billposting.

Leading the Advertising Advance in Chicago

Of cheering significance to all advertisers is the fact that in the first five months of 1924 "the world's greatest merchants"—the Chicago department stores—increased the volume of their advertising in Chicago newspapers by 442,018 agate lines over the same period of 1923.

The total volume of this advertising in the first five months of 1924 was 7,742,704 agate lines.

Of the aggregate gain by all Chicago Papers—442,018 lines—The Chicago Daily News gained more than 62 per cent—275,068 agate lines.

First In Chicago

OHIO FIRST

Ohio must be considered in any National Advertising Campaign whether of minor or major importance.

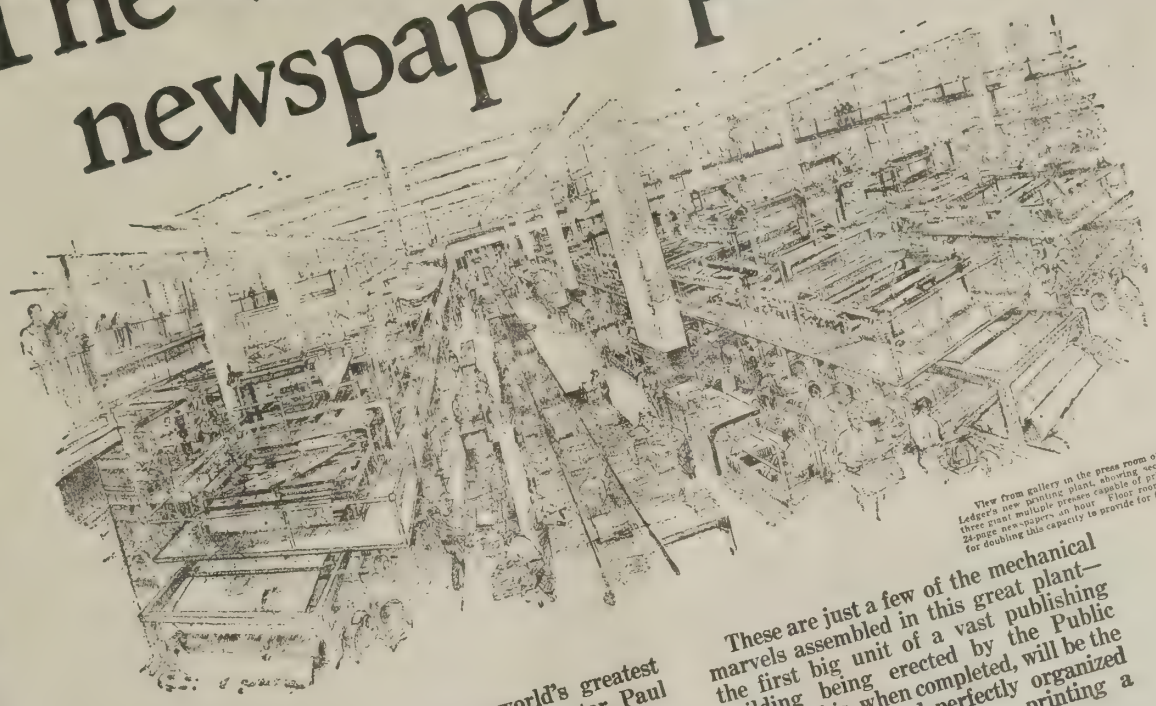
Ohio is First choice of many national advertisers who appreciate the value of intense cultivation of First grade territory.

Ohio leads all other states in the number of large centers, having five cities with a population of 200,000 or over. There are also 21 cities in Ohio with over 25,000 population, and each city has its own daily newspaper.

There are nearly six million people in all—five per cent of the population of the United States—more than 80 per cent of the population is native born white.

National Advertisers who start a campaign in Ohio are in Ohio to stay. There is a very evident understanding between the newspapers and their readers, which is appreciated by the National advertisers.

The newspapers are careful in barring objectionable advertising, and the readers, therefore, have a sales creating faith in advertisements that are published.



You are "in good company" when in an Ohio newspaper of this list. Try them.

"The world's greatest newspaper plant"

View from gallery in the press room of the Public Ledger's new printing plant, showing sections of the three giant multiple presses capable of printing 360,000 24-page newspapers an hour. Floor room is available for doubling this capacity to provide for future growth.

"Have just seen the world's greatest newspaper plant," cabled Senator Paul M. Dupuy, the French publisher, to his Paris office, after visiting the mammoth new printing establishment of the Public Ledger in Philadelphia. "Discontinue work on our new plant until I return."

Three giant presses with a capacity of 360,000 24-page newspapers an hour. One 20-cylinder multiple-color press with a capacity of 20,000 32-page Sunday newspaper sections an hour. A battery of 57 new linotype machines—the largest single installation in history.

These are just a few of the mechanical marvels assembled in this great plant—the first big unit of a vast publishing building being erected by the Public Ledger. This, when completed, will be the most efficient and perfectly organized equipment ever built for printing a newspaper.

The Public Ledger is unique in Philadelphia. Its presses never "sleep." Thirteen regular editions—morning, noon and night—are printed daily, giving readers and advertisers alike a continuity and completeness of newspaper service without competition.

NEARLY 1,000 newspaper men doffed coats and rolled up sleeves to cover the National Democratic Convention in sweltering Madison Square Garden this week.

From north, south, east and west they came to Manhattan visiting Jim Preston, superintendent of the Senate Press Galleries for tickets first, and then visiting the New York Newspaper Club and the club of the New York World and the Baltimore Sun in the Garden basement for hospitality.

As usual, the 4 days preceding the convention, which opened Tuesday, and the first few days thereafter, a large amount of repertorial work was done at various hotels where booms, delegates, and state committees were housed. Main activity centered around the Waldorf. There the United Press, the Associated Press, the Universal Service, and International News Service had installed offices with telegraph connections, keeping them in direct touch with client newspapers.

The New York Times, World, Sun, Post, Herald Tribune, the Chicago Daily News, the Chicago Tribune, and the Philadelphia Public Ledger also had offices at this hotel.

One of the best fitted offices installed by an individual out of town newspaper was that of the Baltimore Sun on the fifth floor of the Biltmore Hotel. Telephone connections direct by private wires to Baltimore had been installed as well as telegraph service. This newspaper was able to boast that the convention was covered by its own staff exclusively without the aid of any syndicate.

When business opened at the Garden Tuesday all press seats were taken. Press associations, of course, claimed seats nearest the speaker's platform which jutted out from the center of one side of the vast oblong hall. Chairs of rough pine had not been built for comfort. Set close together in rows ranging from 4 to 8, there was just about enough room for note taking on the bench table before each row of press seats.

On the first day when Senator Pat Harrison delivered his keynote speech, these seats were occupied by press association executives as well as working news writers. Advance copies of the speech had been received the day before the sessions opened.

Thus to the right of the speaker's rostrum, where the United Press space was located, the EDITOR & PUBLISHER representative noticed Karl Bickel, president of the United Press Associations seated beside Raymond Clapper, the United News political expert, while nearby was Fraser Edwards, writer for the United Press. In the second row of the United Press section sat Roy Howard.

The Associated Press held a corresponding position to the United Press on the left side of the rostrum. Behind the A. P. were seats of the International News Service and the Universal Service. I. N. S. news writers were directed by E. Barry Faris, associate editor. M. Koenigsberg, president, and George C. Shor, general manager, also attended some of the sessions.

The full staff for U. P., under the direction of Fred S. Ferguson, vice-president in charge of news, was as follows:

The following list of news writers at the convention for International News Service was announced: George R. Holmes, James L. Kilgallen, Kenneth Clark, William K. Hutchinson, Edward T. Mahoney, George T. Durno, Roland Krebs, Hubert P. Malkus, E. S. Roddan, Gladstone Williams, Chester T. Crowell, Earle C. Reeves, David M. Church, Miss Helen Fox, Ward Greene, William S. Parker, Raymond T. Borst, Henry Kohn, A. F. Baenzinger, Sherman R. Duffy, Miss Patricia Dougherty and Gus Hayward.

International News also had a feature staff for a special wire made up of Senator Burton K. Wheeler, Senator Medill McCormick, Jack Lait, O. O. McIntyre, and Miss Helen Rowland.

Booms bobbed on waves of hysteria all week, but were seldom taken as important by the bare-armed, hatless veterans of the press who sat and sweated, but kept cool heads while the June sun made Madison Square an oven. In the view of the newspaper section above, those who know them can find possessors of names as well known as Frank B. Noyes, Karl A. Bickel, Arthur Brisbane, M. Koenigsberg, Josephus Daniels, Jackson Elliott, Roy Howard, Frederick Roy Martin, and a host of others whose names appear on this and following pages.

Most of the New York and Brooklyn dailies also had offices in the basement of Madison Square Garden with direct telephone communication to their home city desks.

WHILE THE PRESS SECTION RESTED 'TWEEN PARADES

Reminiscences, Greetings, Cool Bottles (Non-Alcoholic) in a Basement Clubroom and Ritzy Ballrooms Kept Ennui Away Even for Veterans

ONE of the busiest places Monday, before the National Democratic Convention opened was the Madison Square Hotel, where Jim Preston and his aide Jim Donaldson handed out seats to incoming newspaper men.

Hundreds of last minute requests were turned down.

Then the convention opened Tuesday afternoon, and the most popular place, by all odds, for newspaper men was the club room provided by the New York World and the Baltimore Sun. While Pat Harrison was keynoting, crowds of press workers gathered there, listening, sometimes to the speech relayed to the room by radio, and most of the time talking and drinking near-beer and eating hot dogs.

William Johnston of the New York World was in charge acting as host. Paul Patterson of the Baltimore Sun, in Palm Beach suit, was also doing his share of handshaking.

Patterson said the idea of the club originated with the Sun which newspaper had great success with a newspaper men's rodeo staged at the Disarmament Conference in Washington.

"We suggested it to Arthur Krock of the New York World," he explained. "The World did all the work and we come in for half the glory."

The cool of the club room was relief after the circus heat in the Garden proper. Situated in the basement, and well ventilated, it was always comfortable though crowded. Easy chairs, refreshments, and reading matter were features.

"Hello Herb!"

"Hi, Herb old man!"

"Well if it isn't Herb!"

Yes it was Herbert Bayard Swope, executive editor of the New York World. slowly making his way across the club room floor between rows of extended hands.

Swope had left the convention platform to meet old newspaper friends. And he found them in plenty.

"Nine tenths garbage," reflected Henry L. Mencken of the Baltimore Sun, talking about the elaborate mechanical arrangements installed in the Garden to flash convention news to the world.

These "technical details" for speeding news transmission, radio, telegraph, cable and telephone, Mencken classed as "absolutely useless" in covering the Democratic sessions.

"Why, for a convention like this," he remarked, "these mechanical arrangements are in the class with fire escapes—useless except about every 8 years or so, and d—— useful then.

"I can write a much better story if I sit down to it, than I can blahing it over the telephone," he explained.

The only purpose of a convention as Mencken sees it, is that it affords a certain amount of fun.

"If men in their private capacity sat down and argued as these delegates are arguing now, you would call them idiots, wouldn't you?

Mencken has been covering political conventions for 24 years. He missed a few, when he held positions of city editor and Sunday editor.

Meanwhile upstairs in the press seats, coats off, fans waving, some 600 news writers were chronicling convention proceedings.

Sam W. Small, 73 years old, displayed suspenders as he sat behind a pair of opera glasses. Small covered the Democratic convention in New York in 1868. He is with the Atlanta Constitution. He is also famous for being founder of the Oklahoma City Oklahoman, and the Norfolk (Va.) Pilot, and for being the father of Robert T. Small of the Consolidated Press.

Women were numerous in the press section this year, looking cool in summer frocks. One of the prettiest was Marguerite Ely, writing the "woman's angle" for the St. Louis Globe-Democrat. She has been in the profession 2 years. Women politicians are easy to interview she claims. They usually have something worthwhile to say and go right to the point.

Also of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat was Charles P. Keyser, who has attended conventions since 1900.

An old timer in the press section was James W. Green, editor of the Buffalo Express. He has covered every national convention since 1884, not merely looking on but writing stories for the Express.

Soft-voiced elderly women were selling convention extras of the Christian Science Monitor along Madison avenue. Certainly an innovation in New York. Some automobiles were decorated with signs of the same newspaper, urging the public to buy from newsstands or read in libraries.

New York Evening World and the New York Evening Post featured telegraph news from home towns for delegates. The World used mastheads of the following newspapers: Little Rock Arkansas Gazette, Birmingham Age-Herald, Phoenix (Ariz.) Republican, San Francisco Chronicle, Denver Rocky Mountain News, St. Paul Pioneer Press, Baltimore Sun, Atlanta Journal, Des Moines Register, Boise Idaho Daily Statesman, Chicago Daily News, Indianapolis Star, Topeka Daily Capital, Louisville Courier-Journal, St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Boston Daily Globe, Detroit Free Press, Salt Lake Telegram, Richmond Times-Dispatch, Burlington (Vt.) Free Press, Dallas Morning News, Pittsburgh Post, Manchester (N. H.) Union, Reno Gazette, New Orleans States, Jackson Daily News, Omaha Daily News, Memphis Commercial Appeal, Columbia State, Albuquerque Herald, Oklahoma City Oklahoman, Raleigh (N. C.) News and Observer, Cleveland Times and Commercial, Portland Oregonian, Seattle Times, and Milwaukee Journal.

Mr. and Mrs. William Randolph Hearst gave a ball in honor of visiting Democratic delegates at the Ritz-Carlton hotel Wednesday evening. More than 600 attended. Among those invited were George Hearst, the publisher's son, who works on the New York Mirror, and Mrs. George Hearst; Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Brisbane; Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Bayard Swope; Mr. and Mrs. Clark Howell; Mr. and Mrs. E. T. Meredith and Miss Meredith; Mr. and Mrs. Victor Hanson.

Delegate news was printed in daily newspapers issued separately by 23 of the visiting delegations: The Wyoming delegation's paper was called the Powder River. The Florida Cracker was issued by John Perry, president of the American Press Association and owner of the Pensacola (Fla.) Journal.

Mrs. James M. Thomson, daughter of Champ Clark, reported the convention for the New Orleans Item, her husband's newspaper.

"Sunlight arc" lamps, with a total o 60,000,000 candle power, aided newspape camera men and moving picture photog raphers in taking pictures of the conven tion.

Thomas M. Callahan, editor of th Lafayette (La.) Advertiser, stopped ove in New York to see the convention. H was in charge of a 44-piece boys' ban of the Rotary Club of Lafayette, La. which had been attending the Rotary convention in Toronto.

Keith Saunders, 13, son of W. O Saunders, editor of the Elizabeth Cit (N. C.) Independent, was wearing page badge at the convention, given hin by Norman E. Mack, publisher of th Buffalo Times, and national committee man. Without letters of introductio Keith interviewed William Jenning Bryan, W. G. McAdoo, Governor Smith Will Rogers, Josephus Daniels, Georg Gordon Battle, Irving Berlin and Senato Carter Glass.

Miss Esther Ogden, Lora Kelley, o the Cleveland Plain Dealer, and Cor Rigby and Marjorie Shuler of the Chris tian Science Monitor, made speeches a a reception given visiting newspape women at the New York Newspape Women's Club Sunday.

By RING LARDNER

Reprinted from The Club Reporter, Official Organ, New York Newspaper Club

THE writer has been ast to give a few hints in regards to "covering" the convention for the benefit of visiting out of town newspaper men. "Covering" is a slang expression I use sometimes and means about the same as reporting so when I say "covering" the convention I mean practally the same like I said "reporting" the convention.

I would advise visiting reporters the 1st. thing when they get to N. Y. is to find out where is the convention to be held and write it down vs: "Madison Square Garden" and memorize the location of same "Fourth ave. around 26th st." so as when you go back home and the madam says where was the convention held you can tell her it was held in Madison Square Garden, on Fourth ave. around 26th st. I learnt this lesson 4 yrs. ago when I got home from "covering" the convention in San Francisco and my Mrs. had to say something so she says where did they hold the convention and I was kind of staggered on acct. of not having no idear where had they held the convention so I says what did you say to give me time to think up something and she repeated the question and I said why they held it in the auditorium out near the presidio. This got by all right because in the 1st place she don't hardly know what state is San Francisco in and in the 2d. place she was not listening as she did not give a dam where it was held but some wifes is different.

Now I don't want nobody to think I have got anything against Madison Square Garden and in fact I am fond of same as it is the only place I know of in the east where a person can be sent to "cover" a fight and not get his skull fractured by a policeman when you show them your press ticket, but on the other hand I could name a whole lot of nicer places to spend the convention a specially as the Garden has been host all spring to Ringling's circus and certainly ain't had time to get aired out which you wouldn't know the difference any way after the delegates had been in there a couple hours.

The boys around the Newspaper Club can give you the names of these other places I refer to and you will find the most of them equipped with tables which you can write your stuff on after they been wiped off and at this junction I would like to caution the visiting brothers vs. over writing. 200 words a day is plenty for a democrat convention and most of the time it ain't necessary to do more than send your managing editor a telegram saying see A. P. for what come off today. "A. P." is the nickname I got up for the Associated Press. If you send your stuff by mail it is a good idear to use copy paper rather than the back of a menu card.

In the case the boys around the Newspaper Club refuses to give the desired information, why one of the best places I know of to work is the Rendezvous (pronounced Rendezvous) on 45th. st. the head quarters of Gilda Gray and if she had not of went to Europe you could of ast for Miss Gray and mentioned my name as I and her are just like that.

HOW PUBLIC OPINION IS MADE—DANIELS

Former Navy Secretary at Democratic Convention Tells Editor & Publisher Reporter 95 Per Cent of People Read, 5 Per Cent Listen—Clash of Minds in Press Best Substitute for Personal Contact

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

"APPEAL to reason to sway public opinion?

"Certainly not.

"Appeal to emotions, rather.

"As a North Carolina friend of mine once remarked, if you take the people in a state as individuals, they are a sensible lot. Take the same people collectively and they are a set of damn fools.

"We have hardly yet learned how to act collectively."

Josephus Daniels was talking; Daniels, who has been the butt of public opinion, as well as one of its creators, during life-long public service as newspaper publisher and politician.

The point in question was the Democratic National Convention, a gaudy cosmetic applied this week to the face of New York City.

Music of bands. Whispers. Loud talk. Cheers. Songs. Shouting. Oratory. Screaming newspaper headlines.

Public opinion was being moulded. What were the processes?

Mr. Daniels had been asked that question. And he had detached himself from the blare of the present, in which he himself is taking a part, as committeeman from North Carolina, to give philosophical reply as newspaper man, publisher of the Raleigh (N. C.) News and Observer.

He began conversation with a negative.

"Like everything great," he said, "the formation of public opinion follows no formula.

"The processes of public opinion are not made by man. They must merely be taken advantage of by a newspaper or a man who, at a psychological moment, knows how to play on the emotions of other men so as to make an impression.

"Why was Woodrow Wilson?" he asked.

"Why was Theodore Roosevelt?

"Who can explain the rise to power of these two men, as wide apart as the world?"

Mr. Daniels, although first giving the impression the questions could not be answered, made reply himself, leaning a little nearer to the writer.

"I have a feeling in my heart," he declared, "that when great crises arise in this world, a man is raised up of God to meet them."

My ear was not tuned to receive reference to the Deity in the interview. The reply had to be repeated.

"Providence isn't indifferent to this world of ours," Mr. Daniels continued after the repetition. "Without help of public opinion someone in time of need will emerge from the least expected corner to lead the public.

"He may come from a hut like Lincoln; from a college like Wilson. He may come from the ranks of labor like MacDonald, and he probably will.

"Men are not made famous by newspapers. Newspapers simply uncover and inform about great men."

The processes of public opinion, Mr. Daniels believes, begin with personal contact, interchange of opinion; at forums, where people can talk together, read, and discuss together. Clash of sentiment and reason starts public opinion.

"The best public opinion," he continued, "is made by people who have time to read, who have time to sit down and talk to each other.

"That is the trouble with big cities. Modern conditions deny opportunity to people to confer together.

"Then other processes of forming public opinion are newspapers and lecturers.

"Every now and then a man arises with a message. In a great city he must shout his message from the housetops. He has to be a little extreme or he won't be heard at all.

"In this connection, two men of New York come to my mind at the moment. They were able to bring their messages to the people living on Fifth avenue, the Greenwich Village intellectuals, the Bowery bums and sweat shop workers.

Josephus Daniels

"I mean Roosevelt and Al Smith.

"Somehow, whether you like the men personally or not they were able to put themselves across to the public. One cannot explain their power.

"Nowadays, public opinion cannot be made without the newspapers. Ninety-five per cent of the population reads, while only five per cent listen.

"The clash of opinions in newspapers is the best substitute for personal contact.

"And, therefore, to my mind, reduction of the number of newspapers in cities of the United States is not a good thing.

"In a city like New York the Munsey consolidations have resulted in a positive loss to the community.

"If a newspaper has no mission or real purpose to serve the sooner it dies the better. But if it has mission and purpose, it is an essential moulder of public opinion, whether it is good opinion or bad.

"The New York Herald, following the long absentee ownership of James Gordon Bennett, had lost its freshness and vigor. When it was combined with the Tribune, I believe it had come to a point where it no longer had a gospel to preach.

"Mr. Munsey and the New York Tribune were printing the same old antiquated gospel. There wasn't need for both in the New York field.

"If the Tribune had been printing the vitalized truth as it was under Horace Greeley, it could not have gone to bed with the Herald.

"In the old days, when Greeley, alive and vigorous, ready to die for the truth, and Bennett, considering news more important than opinion, the two newspapers were wide apart. But both newspapers had been brought to a point where they said the same things in the same way.

"If a newspaper is run from its counting house, on the other hand, the sooner its death knell is rung the better."

THE FIRE REPORTER

Now this is a story of Reginald Green,
As slick a reporter as ever was seen,
Who drifted one day from the grasses, and came To the City of Cliffs and the Newspaper Game.

Deliciously raw, he accepted the laugh
From the Veriest Cub to the Pride of the Staff,
And took his degrees like the sport that he was
And ran the same gamut that everyone does.
They handed him lemons and quinces and limes,
But he kneeled to the leathers and stuck to The Times;
And hugging his hunch, went 'way out on the limb
Till the best of the fellows had nothing on him.

To skip all the details, rewriting, and stuff
That everyone draws when he runs in the rough,
This Reginald Green swung his wickedest arm
When he thrilled to the punch in a fire alarm!
There was something uncanny in Reginald's taste
For the elements laying a city in waste
And the way he could write it! . . . He rushed you along
To the yells of the linemen, the clang of the gong!

On duty or off, there never was a glare
From a blaze in the town but our Hero was there!
He slept in his clothes, and his dreams were the dreams
Of chemical vapors and catapult streams!
And let but a spark start aflame up the street,
A shower of sparks kicked from Reginald's feet
A thousand hot stories all hatched in his mind.

Then Reginald died; . . . even so go we all
When the General Alarm sends its clarion call!
And because he was good, he was wafted above
To the region of jasper walls, halos and love!
But I shall not think he is happy up there
With nothing but music and peace in the air;
Nay, happier far were his Heaven below
Where forever and ever the Fire Gongs go!

And that is the story of Reginald Green,
As slick a reporter as ever was seen;
Peace be to his ashes! . . . and may he rest well
Whose favorite heaven is other folks' hell.

ST. LOUIS, SCRANTON AD CLUBS WIN

Awarded London News and Star Free A. A. C. W. Trips for Progressive Work—Each Group to Name Representative

Advertising clubs of St. Louis and Scranton, Pa., have been awarded the two prizes offered by the London News and the London Star, for the greatest accomplishments made by clubs affiliated with A.A.C.W. during the year ending June 15, it was announced this week.

The committee of judges which made the selection was composed of Paul T. Cherington, chairman of the educational committee, Harry D. Robbins, chairman of the National Vigilance Committee, and Earle Pearson, educational director, A.A.C.W.

The prize in each case is a free trip to the London convention, July 13 to 18.

The man to make the trip will be selected by the advertising club on the basis of his contribution to the work which enabled his club to win the contest.

In making the awards the activities of the clubs entered in the contest were considered from a standpoint of effective advertising and selling, vigilance work, educating the public to the value of advertising, and community development.

The committee of judges made the following report: "Members of the Scranton club, which took first place among the small cities, took the lead in arranging a community chest fund of $605,000 and a fund for a Chamber of Commerce building of $405,000. They also succeeded in bringing to Scranton an extraordinary list of prominent speakers on advertising and business subjects and gained the co-operation of all of Scranton's newspapers in preserving Truth-in-Advertising. A paid publicity man was employed to keep the activities of the club before the public. They also raised $12,000 for the formation of a Better Business Bureau.

"The St. Louis advertisers in winning the large city contest have also to their credit a commendable list of achievements, among which was the maintenance of a school of advertising and merchandising, with an average attendance of more than 175 students, under the tutelage of 9 paid instructors.

"They conducted 4 departmentals—direct mail, better letters, advertising promotion and financial. Fifty luncheon meetings were held during the year with an average attendance of 285. They also secured for St. Louis the outstanding national direct mail convention of the year with a registration of 1,600 advertising men. They placed 161 men in positions connected with advertising and assisted 46 employers of advertising men to locate suitable people for positions open."

Reservations are being held for the winners on the S. S. Republic, which will carry part of the American delegation to London, sailing July 2.

Buffalo News to Build

The Buffalo Evening News has purchased and is razing a 5-story building adjoining its press room and will erect a new building, 67 by 134 feet, for additional presses and paper storage.

TWO NEW DAILIES LAUNCHED IN NEW YORK

Hearst's Mirror, Morning Picture Tabloid, Aims at 90 Per Cent Entertainment, 10 Per Cent News—Enwright's Evening Bulletin Disclaims Any "Highbrow" Tendencies

THE common people of New York, unnumbered and with incalculable capacity for thrills, added to their store of goodies during the week the Daily Mirror, six-day morning, published in tabloid form by the Hearst organization, and the New York Bulletin, by the New York Examiner, Inc., of which Frederick W. Enwright is president and Frank B. Flaherty, secretary.

E. M. Alexander

Both newspapers appeared to get wide distribution over the metropolitan area, and entered the fight with zest.

The Daily Mirror was strikingly similar in its physical aspects to the New York Daily News, published by the Chicago Tribune organization, and five years old this week. The first number was 32 pages, heavily devoted to news picture and comics, and was entirely consistent with the editorial announcement which read:

"How do you do?

"Daily Mirror is pleased to meet you, hopes to know you for many a year, and to deserve your friendship.

"This newspaper will endeavor to render service to its readers, faithfully representing their interest.

"Daily Mirror's program will be 90 per cent entertainment, 10 per cent information—and the information without boring you.

"We ask readers to write and tell us what they do not like. Daily Mirror's motto will be 'short, quick, and make it snappy.'"

There was no evidence that Walter Howey, former managing editor of the Chicago Herald-Examiner and later Boston American, now in editorial command of the Mirror, strained in any way to get the ten per cent information quota into the first issue.

The appeal was frankly to the primitive cliff-dwellers of the great city, not in any way slighting the interests of the gentle sex.

A picture taken in Champion Jack Dempsey's training quarters shows him lifting the weights in the person of a gay little Broadway flapper loidy. Another displayed picture, in fact the largest picture in the first number, concerns the arduous duty of a man in a cop's uniform measuring the slender underpinning of "Mae McLaughlin" in bathing costume, the object being to determine the correct, meaning modest, expanse of nudity allowable on the beach.

There were a number of first-class legitimate news pictures.

There were two five-column serial sketches, to tell the stories of a murder near New York and violence in Italy. Several well-known Hearst features were used, including Fay King in a new strip. The continued story was, of course, "Flaming Youth," and the first daily short story was entitled "A Queen of Broadway."

The first number carried about 40 per cent advertising. The Daily Mirror sells for two cents.

Barclay H. Warburton, Jr., who will be 26 years old this month, is president of the Public Press Corporation, publishers. Warburton's father was at one time owner of the Philadelphia Evening Telegraph, which was founded by Charles E. Warburton after the Civil War.

Mr. Warburton has held positions on the Philadelphia Evening Telegraph and the Philadelphia Public Ledger. He says he has worked in the press room, and composing room and has covered a district as reporter for the latter newspaper He left the Public Ledger recently and was doing magazine writing until named president of the Public Press Corporation on June 24.

E. M. Alexander is vice-president of the corporation and publisher of the Mirror. He was formerly advertising director of the New York Evening Journal, and before that advertising director of the New York Herald. In 1910 he was advertising manager of Cosmopolitan Magazine and Harpers Bazar.

The secretary-treasurer of the corporatino is George d'Utassy. When the New York Daily News, also a picture tabloid, was founded in June 1919, d'Utassy was its business manager. Formerly he had been general manager of the Hearst magazines. On April 1, 1920, he resigned from the News to become associated as part owner with Charles Dana Gibson of Life. He had since returned to the Hearst organization.

The plant of the new tabloid is situated at 55 Frankfort street, in the shadow of Brooklyn Bridge. Press rooms are located on the ground floor. The editorial department is on the second floor; the composing room on the third, and the business offices on the fourth.

In its first issue the New York Bulletin carried 24 pages, also selling for 2 cents, one cent less than any other Manhattan evening newspaper.

Enwright and his associates were plainly influenced in make-up by the Boston Telegram. The paper went in for eight-column banner lines, and broke the column rules at will to gain display effects. There was liberal advertising patronage. The news was intensely local. International News Service furnished telegraph and cable news. Three pages were given to sports. The back page was reserved for editorials and cartoons.

Enwright's bold-face editorial announcement, signed "owner and publisher," in part said:

"In this, the first issue of the New York Bulletin, I am going to make a plain, simple statement of policy so that you may know the kind of newspaper I am going to produce.

"The success of my publications in other cities has convinced me that a newspaper can find a field in any city if that newspaper loyally serves the plain people. There are too many organs of class, too many highbrow journals concerned only with the vagaries of the rich and there are too few newspapers telling of the hopes and fears, the joys and sorrows, of the plain people.

"New York, to the Bulletin, will not be a city composed of Wall Street, Fifth Avenue, the gilded palaces along the river, and the harbor choked with private yachts; it will be a city of millions of men and women who are toiling every day attempting to secure food and shelter, a city of little children who ask only for an opportunity to live and become men and women as good as their fathers and mothers are.

F. W. Enwright

"I have stated very plainly to my associates in this enterprise that always the doors of the Bulletin offices must open to every man and woman who knocks at them, that the poor and the humble must be shown as much courtesy as the millionaire who drops from his limousine, that the struggling and the oppressed must be assisted and helped and that, whenever any man or woman is harassed or abused, my newspaper must take up that fight and win that fight," the statement continues.

"And I have directed that in the office of the New York Bulletin, and in its columns, there must be no color line, no class line, no race line, no creed line. The New York Bulletin recognizes the fact, too long ignored, that New York is a city which has been built by the sons and daughters of the immigrant and that it was from Ellis Island and from old Castle William, not from Wall Street, that flowed the stream of honest, hard-working men and women who made this the world's greatest city.

"The men and women who will work with me building the New York Bulletin understand clearly that at the close of each day, when the last edition has been published, I would rather be told that the New York Bulletin had aided some mother of little children, had taken up the fight of some hard-working father, or had brought back the smile to the face of some child, than to be told that the New York Bulletin had won the favor and the plaudits of the richest man the metropolis can boast of."

The Madison Square Garden convention gave the Bulletin an opportunity to open its political guns and it revealed hot Democratic partisanship, with strong preference for Gov. Al. Smith and the Tammany organization. It jumped into a fight on the K.K.K. in its first days of operation which, for insensity, has not been exceeded by any newspaper coming to our notice.

The Bulletin soon gave evidence that it was not averse to a salacious story, and a first-page display concerning Harry Thaw and a Park Avenue woman, was raw and reminiscent of journalism of twenty years ago. The point of the story was that Harry was seen to leave the apartment at three A. M. In many respects the Bulletin seemed more like the journalism of the 80's than that of 1924.

The paper went after local news concerning all sorts of people and carried a liberal amount of magazine features. In its first issue it gave two pages to amusements, securing special display advertising.

BRITISH WILL MAKE AMERICANS PLAY

Williams and Field Here to Accompany Delegations to A. A. C. W. London Meeting on Official Ships and Promise Continuous Entertainment at Sea and Before, After and During Wembley Convention

COMPLETE plans for entertainment of American delegates to the A. A. C. W. international convention were brought to this country this week by Eric Field, director, Erwoods Limited, international advertising agency, London, and A. H. Williams, sales and advertising manager of Selfridges.

These two British advertising men are in this country to act as liaison officers, straightening out program tangles and making final entertainment arrangements.

Field will leave with American delegates on the official ship Republic, July 2, while Williams will go on the second official ship, Lancastria, which sails from New York July 3. Both will list the 2,000 delegates for the various entertainment functions, and deliver lectures, detailing plans made for the Americans during their stay in England, while aboard ship.

As it now stands, the program of the social and entertainment committee consists of an almost continuous round of gayety from the moment both boats arrive in England until July 26, when a group of 500 will be entertained in Paris, by French advertising men.

While care has been taken not to interfere with business sessions of the conclave, Field points out, the entertainment as finally arranged now proves one of the biggest features of the convention.

As previously announced in EDITOR & PUBLISHER, there will be a reception on arrival July 12 of the two official boats by the Rt. Hon. G. H. Roberts and Edgcumber Brighton, representing the social and entertainment committee, followed by a civic reception by the Mayor, Aldermen, and councellors of Southampton, supported by the Southampton Chamber of Commerce.

Then delegates will take special trains to London, for the grand reception and ball to be held at Royal Albert Hall, starting at 8.30 Saturday evening, July 12.

In the receiving line at the reception will be the Rt. Hon. Lord Mayor of London, Rt. Hon. Viscount Burnham, and Rt. Hon. Viscount Leverhulme. At the ball the lord mayors of all large British cities will have boxes.

For the first time in history, with the exception of occasions of royal funerals or weddings, more than 1,000 seats have been reserved in Westminster Abbey for a service starting at 10.15 Sunday morning, at which the Lord Bishop of Durham will be preacher. For Catholics there will be a special mass at Westminster Cathedral at 12 o'clock.

At 12.30 Sunday a reception will be given by the Women's Advertising Clubs of London to the American business women at the Savoy Hotel. Program following the luncheon will continue past 4 o'clock, when tea will be served.

Fred B. Smith, who attracted considerable attention by his address at the 1923 A. A. C. W. convention, will speak this year on "The New Force in International Relationship" at an inspirational meeting, which, according to the revised program, will be held at the Central Hall Westminster, Sunday afternoon.

For 7.30 Sunday evening, the Federation of Master Process Engravers of England have arranged an informal dinner of welcome to engravers from America at the Hotel Cecil.

One thousand delegates, to be selected under Fields' and Williams' direction, will attend a reception at 8.30 Sunday evening at Lansdowne House, given by Gordon Selfridge. This reception will continue until 11 o'clock.

The feature of the entertainment planned for Monday, July 14, will be the dinner at the Savoy Hotel for 500 delegates, who will be guests of the British Empire Exhibition. Officials of the Exhibition are the Prince of Wales, who is president, the Duke of Devonshire, Lord Stevenson and Major General Sir Travers Clarke

A. H. Williams and Eric Field—They'll go back to England next week as Britain's supercargo over the 2,000 Wembley-bound Americans.

Following the dinner, all Americans are invited to a sightseeing trip to the Exhibition at Wembley.

Another function Monday evening will be a dinner arranged by the British Association of Display Men to be held at Frascati's, London.

During Monday afternoon, wives of delegates will be taken on tours of Old London planned and directed by the British Ladies Entertainment Committee.

The morning and afternoon of Tuesday, July 15, will be given over to entertainment of women who are accompanying their husbands to the convention. After the convention sessions open, at 10.30, more tours of London will be made. At 1 o'clock a lunch has been arranged by the ladies' entertainment committee for American women at the Criterion, followed by a visit to the Royal Academy, returning in time for a dress parade or fashion show at the Piccadilly Hotel.

Great care has been taken to make this fashion show as perfect as possible. Airplanes will rush latest models from Paris. All the leading exclusive fashion houses of London will be represented, and models will be shown which have never before been made public.

Besides the lunch for accompanying women, four other group luncheons have been provided for Tuesday. At 11 o'clock some of the overseas delegates will be guests of the directors of Harrods Limited. Sir R. Woodman Burbridge, president of the Incorporated Association of Retail Distributors and chairman of Harrods Limited, is in charge.

The Special Press Representatives Section will lunch at the Marylebone room of the Great Central Hotel at 1.30. At the same hour, the Association of National Advertisers and the Screen Advertising Section will lunch at the Princes Restaurant.

The big official dinner of Tuesday will be that of the club presidents to be held in the Georgian room of the Piccadilly Hotel, preceded by a reception starting at 6.45.

Five other banquets are on the program for Tuesday.

They are: the banquet to overseas engravers at the Victoria Hotel, arranged by the Federation of Master Process Engravers of England; the banquet at Guildhall, the seat of London city government, by permission of the Lord Mayor of London and the Corporation, arranged by the Advertising Agents Section; another at the Kings Hall, Holborn Restaurant, arranged by the Incorporated Sales Managers' Association of the United Kingdom; a fourth at the Connaught rooms arranged by the Association of National Advertisers; and a fifth at Princes Restaurant, arranged by the Screen Advertisers Section.

One hundred American delegates will be entertained Tuesday evening, July 15, by the Publicity Club of London at the Winter Garden Theatre to witness a performance of "Tonight's the Night," followed by a buffet supper, dance and cabaret show in the Victoria Hall of the Hotel Cecil.

Eight different luncheons are on the program for Wednesday to provide for all of the 2,000 Americans. Of special interest to newspaper men delegates will be that held in Stationers Hall, Ludgate Hill, and at which the newspaper executives of London headed by Viscount Burnham and the Rt. Hon. Lord Riddell will be hosts.

Other Wednesday lunches are: at the Lucullus Restaurant, British Empire Exhibition, Wembley, arranged by the Graphic Arts Section; at Libertys, Regent street, arranged by the Ladies' Entertainment Committee; at Grand Hall, Hotel Cecil, as guests of the American Chamber of Commerce; another as guests of the Association of National Advertisers; as guests of the Retail Advertisers Section; and as guests of the Screen Advertisers Association.

Mrs. Hylton Phillipson, M. P., formerly Miss Mable Russle, American actress, has arranged to give 50 American women delegates tea on the Terrace of the House of Commons, open only to Members of Parliament and their guests.

The London Daily Chronicle has taken the whole of His Majesty's Theatre, and all delegates will be entertained Wednesday evening at a gala opera performance by the British National Opera Company. Sir Howard Spicer is largely responsible for this feature of the program.

The grand ball of the convention will be held at Olympia Hall Thursday evening. During the day, Lord Waring will entertain guests at lunch in the Lucullus Restaurant of the British Empire Exhibition, Wembley, and there will be a dinner to French-speaking delegates in the Georgian room of the Piccadilly Hotel.

With delegates freed from convention business, golf is scheduled to enter the program on Friday, July 18. One hundred delegates will be guests of Lord Riddell at Walton Heath. They will be carried to the golf course by automobiles, leaving the Hotel Victoria at 8.30 in the morning.

The following trophies will be open for competition:

Trophy presented by Lord Riddell.

Trophy presented by the Strand Magazine.

Trophy presented by London Opinion.

A four-ball foursome bogey round will be held for prizes presented by C. Arthur Pearson, Limited, the London Illustrated News, the London Star and Daily News, the London Daily Mail, and the Allied Newspapers, Limited.

The Federation of Master Process Engravers has also arranged for golf at Moor Park.

For the same day, Major the Hon. J. J. Astor, M. P., has invited 1,000 delegates to Hever Castle, Kent. The party will leave London by special train at 11.30 a. m.

Lord Ashfield and the directors of the London Underground Railway have invited 600 delegates to visit Hampton Court Palace between 2 and 7 o'clock Friday. Those in this party will leave Northumberland avenue at 2 o'clock in motor coaches.

Five hundred retail advertisers will be guests at a ball given Friday evening at Lansdowne House by Gordon Selfridge, starting at 9 o'clock in the evening.

On Saturday, July 19, overseas advertising agents will be taken by automobile to Windsor, Leaving at 10 o'clock and arriving at 11.15. After being shown over the castle by the Dean of Windsor, luncheon will be served in Windsor Great Park by permission of the Chief Ranger.

After this date the provincial tours, as detailed recently in EDITOR & PUBLISHER, will be held. A few changes in the provincial tour program were announced by Mr. Field. In the first place, all the tours have been so changed as to allow delegates to return to London July 25 in time to leave on the trip to Paris the following day.

Then on Tuesday, July 22, a day trip to Oxford and Stratford-on-Avon has been added to the schedule. The tour to the Midlands has been cancelled and included with the trip to Lancaster and Nottingham.

The cathedral town tour, originally planned as a single excursion to historic edifices, has been divided into 2 short tours in order to make certain return to London by July 25.

VAST FARM WEALTH AND POPULATION NEGLECTED BY LARGER DAILIES

Ignorance of Agricultural Needs Barring Newspapers from Rich Field, Says Prominent Farm Page Editor—Enormous Rural Buying Power Shown

By FRED W. LEU

"MANURE SPREADER," "Apple duster," "Cow Valet" and "Hen Nurse" are a few of the appelatives that were employed in addressing the writer, 7 years ago, when he made bold to establish probably the first effort of its kind—a daily form page in a newspaper with 100,000 circulation.

The superlative, in description, is generally employed when one essays to deviate from the beaten path. The boys meant nothing serious. I smiled, although I would have had a comeback, had I known, at the time, that the wealth of this country is represented by $78,000,000,000 invested in agriculture and but $44,000,000,000 invested in industry. It should have been an easy matter to ask them to laugh that off.

Still, while I have had the pleasure of seeing literally hundreds of agriculture departments established in newspapers, during those years, too few of the large daily newspapers recognize the fact that by far the great majority of population of this country is influenced by the appeal of the country. The census tells us that 73,500,000 of the 110,000,000 people of the country live in towns of 50,000 on down, and on farms.

They go ahead making newspapers for the butcher, the baker, the candlestick maker, the cook and the preacher, who invariably spend every nickel they make, as fast as it comes in, to the exclusion of the farmer who when he does spend, makes it worth the while of the man from whom he buys. Take 200 city people of all classes and determine their average holdings. An average investment of 200 such farmers in Henry county, Ohio, totals $23,330. I leave it with you which circulation will mean the most to the advertiser.

According to the United States Department of Commerce, in 1921 wages in all concerns, with an annual output of $5,000 per year, was $4,000,000,000 less than the value of the crops and livestock on U. S. farms for that year. Annually, farmers in this country, produce more than $12,000,000,000 of new wealth.

If every farm family in the United States was to spend $100 during the year for clothing, the manufacturers would be called upon to manufacture $650,000,000 worth of goods, to supply the demand.

If only one out of every 6½ farm families were to build a small chicken coop the wire manufacturers could expect $5,000,000 new business.

Farmers own 30.2 per cent of all of the autos in the United States.

In 1920 the value of the farm implements, on U. S. farms, totaled $470,000,000.

People in the United States who live on farms, or in unincorporated villages total 43,000,000.

Of the 110,000,000 in the United States 73,500,000 live in towns of from 50,000 on down, or on farms, and are greatly influenced by the farm viewpoint.

This would leave but 36,500,000 people for whom, seemingly, the daily newspaper is intended.

The idea that the farmer is an overall-clad creature, of inferior mentality, a consumer of only the product of his hand that he cannot sell, originated in a diseased mind from an unconscious attitude that physical labor is beneath the man that nurtures the thought.

The annual production of apples, oranges and peaches is equal to one year's production of iron ore, plus $200,000,000.

The annual output of poultry, eggs and honey, equals the entire yearly production of oil in America, plus $250,000,000.

The annual livestock production equals the entire yearly production of oil in America, plus $250,000,000.

The annual livestock production equals the annual production of autos and farm implements, plus $350,000,000.

Value of corn and wheat equals total yearly earnings plus $750,000,000.

Some 1921 Statistics

	Value of Production
Agriculture	$12,402,000,000
Food and kindred products	7,850,000,000
Textiles and products	6,961,000,000
Iron, steel and products	5,601,000,000
Lumber and products	2,430,000,000
Leather and products	1,544,000,000
Paper and printing	3,149,000,000
Liquors and beverages	292,000,000
Chemical, allied products	4,537,000,000
Stone, clay, glass products	1,019,000,000
Metals and metal products	1,575,000,000
Tobacco manufactures	1,048,000,000
Vehicles	1,267,000,000
Miscellaneous industries	3,872,000,000

But in spite of these facts, makers of newspapers tread down the beaten path of time, totally oblivious to the fact that there is a potential field of circulation that could be developed, if they only would.

There is a reason for all this. Chancing the indignance of the great staff of worthy souls who build newspapers in this country, I would diagnose the disease as ignorance and no inclination to learn. True this is not 100 per cent true, for, as heretofore mentioned, I have seen scores of agricultural departments established, in both weeklies and dailies.

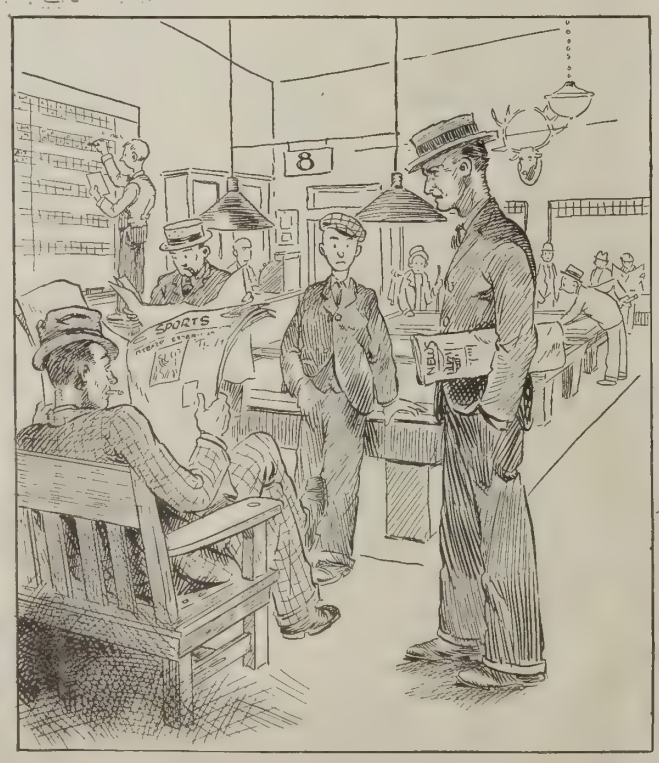
Agricultural publication editors recognize the fact that newspapers head the list of those publications offering the greatest number of circulation, per dollar invested, and I say that just in-so-far as there would be no fraternal institutions, if the churches were alive to their possibilities, so would there be no agricultural publications were the newspapers alive to their biggest circulation possibility.

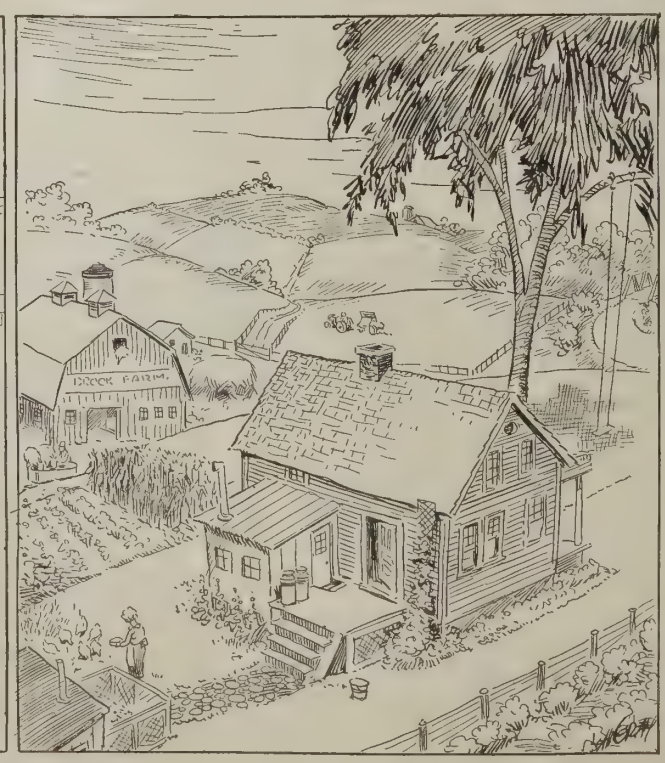
Why do the agricultural leaders cry that the one outstanding need of the United States; the one thing that would save agriculture from the ruin it is now facing, is a better understanding of the needs of the country, by the folk who live in the cities? And the blame for this condition, may even though reluctantly, be shouldered by the men who make the big newspapers of the country.

Aside from any moral responsibility, the business side of the question is my mission. Folks called Frank M. Heller foolhardy, when, as managing editor of the Toledo (O.) News-Bee, he designated the writer as the Farm Editor of his publication. Probably it was the enthusiasm of the desire to help promote farm production to help win the war, that was the cause of this move; surely it was not foolish sentiment, for men who have served long and useful careers in newspaper work are made of sterner stuff. My guess is that Frank M. Heller, born on a farm, realized the need of pulling the tiller of the soil out of the sloth of his self-imposed existence, by the boot-straps of the daily farm page. He realized also, that the road would not be a smooth one, but rather a slow process. Whether he was right in his assumption, may be attested by the fact that today, Frank M. Heller is editor-in-chief of the same publication.

Whether agriculture is fundamental to business success may be gleaned from these figures from the U. S. Department of Agriculture, and the Bureau of Commerce and Labor.



In 1870, with 175,000,000 acres of improved land, there were 425,000 business enterprises in the country; in 1880, with 275,000,000 acres under cultivation, there were 746,000 business concerns; in 1890, with 375,000,000 acres under the plow, that number had increased to 1,500,000 and in 1920, with the acreage increased to 500,000,000 business enterprises increased to 1,800,000.



Another way of looking at the matter: In 1866 the average annual return per improved acre was $14. Failures in business per 100,000 numbered annually 95. From 1868 to 1871 crop returns per acre increased to $16 and failures per 10,000 business institutions decreased to 60. From 1874 to 1877 there was a decline in acreage returns and a consequent increase in the number of business failures.

Does the farm problem touch the hem of your garment? More than 200,000,000 bushels of wheat were lost to this country in one year, because of the prevalence of wheat rust. This could have been saved to the country, with a consequent reduction in wheat food prices, had proper attention been given the elimination of the barberry, the harbor of this disease, through the medium of daily and weekly newspapers. This could be followed with an educational campaign against the cattle tick of the South, the boll weevil, hoof-and-mouth disease, Hessian Fly, European corn borer and many other such, all of equal interest to the city and country.

Why am I so persistent in my quest for recognition of the largest element of people? It is this: Long experience in the country newspaper field, and present continued association with the man who plods the soil, has taught me that his primary interest in a publication is markets. If there is one outstanding reason for his taking a daily paper, it is the markets. In this field the daily newspaper has first call over any type of farm publication. If the farmer can get his farm news in a daily paper, there is no reason why he should burden himself with a half dozen publications, because he is not a great reader, nor inclined to spend money for anything he is convinced is not a necessity. Further than that the best reason for the daily paper taking up the quest for rural circulation is the fact that of the 3 outstanding farm publications in the United States the men in charge of the editorial departments are former newspaper men who brought to their new work all of the ideas they acquired in newspaper work and applied effectively every one of them. When someone outside the staff attempts a farm magazine feature he generally gets the material back with a request for more human interest stuff.

Jazz orgies and wild entertainment, generally begin and end in the city. People of the small town and farm live closer to earth. They exemplify realities and their habits, therefore, are stable. They are the bone and sinew of these United States.

S. N. P. A. PREPARES FOR RECORD CONVENTION

200 Reservations Made for Asheville Meet, July 3-4-5—Program Contains Many Entertainment Features—Johnson Backed for Presidency

GROVE PARK INN, Asheville, N. C., will be putting out the Standing Room Only sign during the latter part of next week, when the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association holds its 22d and what is likely to be its greatest convention to date, at its old headquarters. More than 200 members, friends, and guests have been registered by the hotel and the association committee and probably most of the illustrious members of the group will approach Asheville from the North.

A. G. NEWMYER
President S. N. P. A.

All trains are sold out solid up to Wednesday from New York to Asheville. Having helped to nominate the Democratic Presidential slate, or having told their clientele how it was done, the leaders of Southern journalism will move on Ashville and Dixie will again move South of the Potomac.

Walter C. Johnson, general manager of the Chattanooga News, has told his fellow officers and directors that he can no longer serve them as secretary and treasurer, as he has done for 8 years, because of the responsibilities that have devolved upon him since the recent death of George F. Milton, editor of the News.

Whereupon, aforesaid officers and directors are understood to have agreed that Mr. Johnson should be elected president of the S. N. P. A. as a fitting token that the association appericates the great services he has rendered to it during the past 8 years. And Mr. Johnson, like many other good citizens, prefers the pleasures of life untrammeled by official duties.

But politics aside, the meeting promises plenty of interest—mornings from 9 o'clock till luncheon devoted to business; afternoons to golf and recreation; evenings to dancing, motion pictures, receptions, and other informal amusements. No fast rules are in force governing dress, though light fabrics and golf togs are the most popular garb.

The first meeting will be held on the morning of July 3. President A. G. Newmyer, New Orleans Item will preside.

The second day will be given over to business office affairs. This meeting will be presided over by Edgar M. Foster, Nashville Banner, chairman of the special committee having this matter in charge. This being July 4, a program appropriate to the day has been arranged.

Saturday will be given over to editorial affairs. Maj. John S. Cohen, of the Atlanta Journal, chairman of this committee, will have charge of this session. The principal speaker will be J. Fred Essary, vice-president of the Gridiron Club, Washington, D. C.

Election of officers will take place the second day.

A special feature of the gathering and one which is to be tried out for the first time at the request of a number of members in a series of group meetings made up of representatives from different papers of varied circulation. Each gathering will have chairman, vice-chairman, and secretary.

These are the high spots of the business sessions. A golf tournament for both the men and women is being arranged for which eight or ten trophies will be awarded. Teas, bridge, and mah jong parties and other entertainment will be given in honor of the women visitors. Included in the list will be a tea at the Baltimore country club. A number of automobile rides have also been arranged.

The ladies' entertainment committee is composed of the following women: Mrs. Walter C. Johnson, chairman; Mrs. Alfred Sanford, Mrs. E. O. Susong, Mrs. George Kohn, and Mrs. Victor H. Hanson.

Among the entertainment features scheduled for the evenings will be an organ recital at Grove Park Inn; special moving pictures, and a ball at Kenilworth Inn on the night of July 4. The convention will close July 4 with a week-end trip to Blowing Rock which is complimentary to the members of the S. N. P. A. and their families upon the invitation extended by W. L. Alexander owner of Mayview Pork.

A series of civic club luncheons will be tendered the visitors during their stay in Asheville.

President Newmyer appointed Charles A. Webb, of the Asheville Citizen a committee to arrange the golf tournaments. In turn Mr. Webb has appointed Clark Howell, Jr., and Walter H. Savory, of the Mergenthaler Linotype Company to assist him. Eighteen holes will be played, members will arrange their own matches, either foursomes of twosomes, and turn in score cards to the committee signed by at least two of the contestants, immediately after finishing play.

NEWSPAPER TYPOGRAPHY AND MAKE-UP

"Want-Ads" vs. Classified Advertising—Utilizing Good Typography and Make-up to Re-vitalize the Classified Pages—How to Put in the Wallop that Tells and Sells

By H. FRANK SMITH

Article XV

EDITORIAL NOTE—Mr. Smith is a special lecturer in the department of Advertising and Marketing at New York University. Newspaper typography in all its phases will be discussed in this department in the last issue of each month. Complete newspapers, as well as individual items—such as headings, advertisements, editorial pages, features, etc.—will be reviewed, and good and bad examples illustrated and commented upon. Publishers, editors, advertisers and readers are invited and urged to send in specimens and to take full advantage of the author's desire to help them with their type problems and make-up.

Replies Cannot Be Made by Mail

SOME newspapers look upon the so-called "want-ads" as a lot of miscellaneous and bothersome items to be used as "fillers" on any page just to get rid of this kind of copy. Other publishers recognize the "want-ad" as an unequalled opportunity to render a very special service to their readers and community, and they also appreciate the news value and profit possibilities of Classified Advertising.

The first publisher is mis-represented by the paper that scatters its "want-ads" in any old hit-or-miss way on any page in which there happens to be a small "hole" left and where a "filler" is needed to justify a column. The second publisher is represented by the paper in which the many different kinds of "want-ads" are thoughtfully sorted and carefully assembled into a directory of opportunities alphabetically arranged in an orderly, easy-to-find—and read—manner, from beginning to end.

The first paper is overlooking the dollar-diamonds in its own territory to chase penny-rainbows in foreign fields; while the second paper is netting big profits from its Classified Advertising, and at the same time is building prestige and good will by rendering a very valuable service to its readers, its display advertisers, and its entire territory.

The first publisher probably is guessing in terms of "cent-a-word want-ads" while the second publisher is planning and working in terms of newsy, serviceable and profitable Classified Advertising.

Classified Advertising Creates New Readers, Better Readers —and More of Them

THE Classified Advertising (not the "want-ads") creates new readers, better readers, and more of them by reason of the fact that if the patrons of the Classified Advertising do not find exactly what they are looking for they will be encouraged to read more of the display advertising, and in reading the display pages they become much better acquainted with the editorial, news, sport and feature pages.

It is not at all unusual for readers of Classified Advertising to buy space themselves, without any solicitation whatever on the part of the newspaper—because if the readers of classified cannot find just what they want, they will advertise for it; voluntarily.

This is especially true of those papers which are continually selling and reselling the reader on the value, convenience and economy of Classified Advertising by using liberal amounts of display advertising to advertise Classified Advertising.

Again, the transient reader of Classified Advertising becoming more familiar with the news, editorial, and feature pages will often develop from a casual reader into a subscriber or daily newsstand buyer.

THE Classified Advertising should be the "Red Book" of the newspaper—segregating these thousand-and-one opportunities from everything else in the paper into a quick-to-find and easy-to-read indexed classification similar to the manner in which the telephone red book separates the business phones from the residence phones.

This means classifying into groups with each group carrying a major title and subheads (perhaps numbered)—all of which should be worked into an index; the major heads and sub-heads arranged alphabetically, or if the sub-heads are numbered they should follow in numerical order, of course.

The make-up merely follows the index with the result that we have a perfectly organized catalog of all kinds of opportunities—a complete index for quick and ready reference file to serve the whole territory.

The result is that when the patron of Classified Advertising is looking for, let's say, Farm Land he merely refers to the index for "Real Estate for Sale," reads down the numbered sub-heads and finds "27-Farms and Land for Sale;" then just turns to sub-head "27" in the column and immediately becomes acquainted with a number of the kind of offerings in which he is particularly interested.

The whole arrangement is simpler than "A-B-C," or "1-2-3," by which combination of letters and figures the most successful (and profitable) system of this kind is known.

Typography and Make-up Important Link in Classified Advertising

NEXT to properly indexing and cataloging the ads, the typography and make-up is perhaps the most important consideration. Despite the fact that Classified Advertising is just ordinary "straight matter" (so far as the actual composition is concerned), nevertheless many classified columns and pages are very hard to read—in fact, repelling instead of attracting the reader. With a little thought and effort we can readily develop a style of typography and make-up with enough "guts" in it to put a "wallop" even in the classified pages.

Let's look at a couple of specimens. Take Fig. 1, for instance, a "want-ad" page (from the Detroit News) which is as dead as the proverbial door-nail!

Here we have the classified set solid in a light-face 5-pt. type carrying an 8-pt. semi-bold (antique) major head with hair-line cut-off rules throughout—printed with an ink that is more gray than black. Then squeezed into the running head are two dinky little 2-line "readers" intended to advertise (?) the advantages of "News Want Ads." The whole page is less inviting to the reader than a desert would be to a vacationist.

Certainly, there must be something radically wrong when a big successful daily like the Detroit News continues this crude and distracting style of typography and make-up for its "want-ads"—especially when it is so easy to put some life, pep and inspiration in these particular pages; in other words, to develop a splendid and wonderful section of real Classified Advertising.

Referring to Fig. 2 we find a very similar page which is made much more attractive and inviting merely by doing only four sensible and simple things: (1) using a slightly larger and bolder group head, (2) incorporating sub-heads wherever possible to help the reader quickly find what he is looking for, (3) using a heavy-and-light rule above, and a little extra white space around, each major head; to enable the reader to see where one classification ends and another begins, (4) using the space at the ends of the running head in which to print the classification, which gives the reader a quick index reference of what is on the page.

Just a brief examination of these two pages proves how easy it is to brighten up the classified page by paying only a little attention to the typography and make-up—not with the idea of putting a "wallop" in the page, but merely to relieve the page of the heavy, dull and repellant monotony resulting from setting the matter solid without any spots of color in the form of sufficiently bold heads, cut-off rules, white space, etc.

Surely, we can agree that Fig. 2 would be more apt to attract the reader than Fig. 1, and that the reader is entitled to have the Classified Advertising presented in a way that it can be read with reasonable compfort.

Putting in the "Wallop" That Makes 'Em Stop, Look, and Read

AMONG my notes I find an item reading: "If a paper is worth anything as an advertising medium it should carry the advertising of the paper itself." It seems to me that this statement applies particularly to Classified Advertising, because I believe the better way to sell readers on Classified Advertising—and keep them sold—is to use the newspaper's own space; and especially on the classified pages.

Hardly anyone relishes the idea of having to wade through column after column of small type, so if there is anything we can do to attract attention and to encourage a more careful reading of the classified pages we ought to do it—because it would appear to be good business—and profitable.

Take, for instance, Fig. 3—a page from the New York American. There's as much difference between Fig. 3 and Fig. 1 as there is between the stage-coach and the airplane—so far as rapid reading is concerned; getting where you want to go in a hurry; finding what you are after quickly, easily, and comfortably.

Analyzing this page (Fig. 3) for a moment we find six things well worth studying in considering our classified pages: (1) a running head (The Great Meeting Place of Men and Opportunities) that inspires confidence, (2) a streamer that attracts attention and encourages reading, (3) an inspiring ad that stimulates the lagging reader, (4) bold boxed heads that guide the reader to the classification he is looking for, (5) sub-heads numerically indexed to help the reader find exactly what he wants and (6) in all, a page with a "wallop" in it that attracts attention, encourages reading, stimulates action, and gets results (for the advertiser as well as the publisher).

How Does Your Classified Look and What Are You Doing to Improve It?

JUST as a matter of information compare your classified pages with these specimens. If they are not all that they should be, start improving them today. Keep improving your classified until it has as much news and pep in it as you want and put into any of your other pages. Do this, and note how your classified lineage will grow, and grow, AND GROW.

Mechanically, it is easy—because once under way it is practically "straight matter." Mentally, it is a little more difficult—because it requires a plan, and newspaper folks do not seem to have enough time for plans; at least typographic and make-up plans. However, here are eight things which any compositor can do, if you will put him in charge of the typography and make-up of the Classified Advertising and tell him to go ahead:

(1) Set the major or group heads in bold-face type at least two sizes (not points) larger than the ads. Ten-point bold would make a good group head for 6-pt. body type.

(2) Set the sub-head in bold-face caps-and-lower-case two points larger than ads—that is, an 8-point face would make a good sub-head for 6-pt. body type.

(3) If a numerical index is used, select a good, plain, legible figure one or two sizes larger than the type used for the sub-head.

(4) Use a different and heavier rule for separating the groups, or classifications, than the hair-line rule used between the ads.

(6) Arrange the Group Headings alphabetically, and if sub-heads are used arrange these numerically.

(7) Make-up the Classified Advertising in a compact group. If it doesn't fill the page, or a half page, or even a column—don't pad it to fill. Padding makes it look cheap and unreliable.

(8) Even if there is only about a column of classified—make it up double column; put a good head on it (not "Cent-A-Word" or "Want-Ads"); and give it an island position (don't bury it among the display advertising). No matter how little classified there is—make it look like a million dollars; make it say something; make it Sell and it will Sell!

Comment and Criticism

A Review of Newspapers With the Idea of Making Friendly and Helpful Suggestions to Improve Typography and Make-Up

By H. FRANK SMITH

Daily Mirror, New York—At first thought one would naturally assume that there are enough capable folks in and about the Hearst organization to easily have created a typogrphic dress for the Daily Mirror that would be entirely different and, perhaps, more attractive than the Daily News (New York's other daily picture tabloid), but apparently such is not the case for the Mirror is practically a typographic facsimile of the News. It's a safe bet that many hurrying morning readers thought they were buying the Daily News last Tuesday morning only to discover later that it was the Daily Mirror they purchased. If "imitation is the sincerest flattery," the Mirror certainly went the limit in following the dress of the News.

Paul Dodge, News, Tucumcari, N. M.—The News is neatly made up and very clearly printed, but you are using to much light-face italic for heads. I don't have to tell you this; you know it. Why don't you put a real newspaper head on your news matter, and make the News even more attractive than it is?

John D. Lawson, Standard, Westport, Conn.—Don't ever let any one kid you again into using that stud-horse Gothic type that titled Shilepsky's ad page two June 19. Another thing, you used too many solid 6-point rules for borders in this issue. Somebody's mussing up the usual attractive typography of the Standard. Stop 'em now (once and for all) before they go too far.

W. Lee Tuller, Reporter, White Plains, N. Y.—I haven't time to carefully examine the weeks's batch of Reporters you sent, but a brief glance over most of the pages indicates that someone very familiar with good typography and make-up is right on the job. The only thing I see that really needs attention is the way you set all your heads—they are too solid, and ought to be opened up with 2-point leads. You might also consider these suggestions: Set the quotation sometimes run at head of editorials in italic; use one size larger type for editorial heads; since the paper is made up so solid it might be advisable to set classified, legals, and maybe radio news in 6-point to gain a column or more of extra space in each issue; replace that asterisk border used on boxed items with something better. I think your first pages could be improved if they were not made up so solid. However, the Reporter is very well taken care of typographically, and whoever is on the job knows what to do, and is undoubtedly making the refinements mentioned above as time permits

Bulletin, New York—While New York's new evening daily has revived world-wartime typography for its front pages, the further we get into each new issue the more sensible the type dress and make-up becomes—except for the unnecessarily extravagant use of one of the blackest and most ugly funeral Gothics ever designed. The whole typographic dress is so forced and strained that sooner or later something must bust—and it probably will be circulation, because a healthy permanent circulation (the kind that advertisers want to buy and we are willing to pay for) cannot be built and maintained by the false note carried in the Bulletin's present style of misleading typography.

Have You a Problem in Typography or Make-up?

PUBLISHERS may have the benefit of Mr. Smith's suggestions by merely sending to EDITOR & PUBLISHER a copy of their paper—or better still, write Mr. Smith direct about any problem of typography or make-up that might be bothering you. NEW AND AUTHENTIC HISTORY OF THE HERALD OF THE BENNETTS

Mr. Bennett was the first editor to give much space to religious news. The printing of sermons delivered by clergymen on Sunday, in the Monday morning Herald was regarded as a startling innovation in 1839. For years Mr. Bennett struggled against a prejudice in some quarters against having affairs in religion reported and discussed in the secular press. There was one clergyman in New York who demanded that a Herald reporter who was present to report his sermon, leave the church, as he declared that his discourse was intended solely for the edification of his own congregation!

In the 'forties, religious anniversaries lasting for a week were customary in New York, and the period came to be known as "Holy Week," the Herald reporting the proceedings in full, and on May 12, 1841, Mr. Bennett thus jocosely referred to it:

"The sinners and rascals who patronize the Herald will get to day a deep dose of religion and piety. Let them swallow it. No harm can come of it."

In June, 1841, he made new arrangements for the distribution of the Herald in New York City, saying:

"I have organized my own corps of carriers and no carrier who touches the Sun or any Wall Street paper will be permitted for a moment to serve the Herald."

The New York Herald Offered For Sale

On October 26, 1842, Mr. Bennett offered the Herald for sale in the following self-explanatory statement:

"The undersigned offers for sale the whole of the New York Herald newspaper establishment, including all its appurtenances as now organized, and of which he is sole proprietor.

"The intention of the undersigned in retiring from the Herald, is to proceed to London as soon as practicable, and to establish in that capital a daily and weekly newspaper, for the purpose of defending, explaining and exhibiting to Europe the institutions, laws, morals, resources, movements and tendencies of the United States, which are now subject—from imperfect knowledge and strong prejudices, to misrepresentation and falsehoods of all kinds and from all quarters. He also intends to establish a branch newspaper in French and English in Paris.

"Materials for printing, consisting of ten presses, types, news boats, etc., costing $25,000.

"Herald Building, having granite columns and brick walls; six stories high, costing $30,000.

"Aggregate annual cash receipts of the Herald, New York Lancet, and other publications as per cash book, $130,000.

"Annual profits of the whole establishment, according to the industry, genius, and enterprise in its management, $15,000 to $25,000.

"Applications for further information are directed to be made to the proprietor,

"JAMES GORDON BENNETT."

The offer was not taken seriously by the public, and on Nov. 2, Mr. Bennett withdrew his establishment from sale, placing upon it a valuation of $200,000.

He intimated however, that while continuing the proprietorship of the Herald, he had made arrangements "to establish a branch newspaper in London and Paris, in the course of next spring or summer, for the purpose of carrying out his original plan of advancing the civilization and brightening the light of the age. New York will be the centre of his operations, as it is now the grand centre of the originality, talent, improvement, wit, science and soul of the age."

Mr. Bennett was rapidly achieving national celebrity, and in August, 1842, referred in his light and breezy way to the honors conferred upon him:

"RISING IN THE WORLD.—We are rising very rapidly in this sinful world. A short time ago, the Corporation of Nauvoo, Ill., conferred upon us the freedom of the city. The next step was to raise us to the dignity of LL.D., a regular Doctor of Laws, by the University of Nauvoo, an honor which we highly prize. * * * *

"Yesterday, blessed be the day, we received by a special messenger from Illinois, an enclosure which contained the parchment, conferring the high military rank upon us of Brigadier General of the Militia of the State of Illinois, and commissioning us as Aid-de-camp to the Major General of the Nauvoo Legion of the Militia."

"There's honor—there distinction—there's salt and greens for a modest, simple, calm, patient, industrious editor. We now take legitimate rank above Col. Webb, Major Noah, Col. Stone, Gen. George P. Morris, and all the military editors of the country. * * * * Hereafter, I am James Gordon Bennett, Freeman of the Holy City of Nauvoo; LL.D. of the University of Nauvoo, and Aid-de-camp to the Major General of the Nauvoo Legion, and also its Brigadier General, with a fair prospect of being a prophet soon, and a saint in Heaven hereafter. Volcanoes and asparagus! What next?"

The joke of it was, that all of these "honors" were instigated by Joe Smith as "Major General," in hopes to gain the support of a powerful eastern newspaper for the tottering Mormon community in Illinois.

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

Development of the Bitter Newspaper War Described—Some Amusing Features of the Conflict—Bennett's Baby Son Joins in the Fray

THAT there were too many newspapers in New York seemed very evident to Mr. Bennett in 1842. Under the heading of "A Newspaper Glut" he wrote the following:

"Another two cent cash newspaper is announced, called the 'Morning Post,' to be conducted by Mr. Godwin, for several years the working editor of the 'Evening Post.' This indicates that the 'Evening Post' is rapidly reaching the 'sere and yellow leaf,' a victim to the empty pride and emptier pretensions of the beggarly respectability of the Wall Street six-penny system. Godwin, we hear is a man of some talents, experience and character. * * * *

"It is said other papers are expected. Very well—come on. There is plenty of room to erect new establishments and lose lots of money. Since we started the Herald, we have seen nearly 30 newspapers start and probably $200,000 lost in fruitless efforts. The 'New Era' sunk nearly $50,000 in the first year of its existence. There is yet room to spend $500,000 in good money in starting newspapers."

A newspaper named the "Union," run by Beach and Noah ceased publication on December 31, 1842, and Mr. Bennett referred to Noah in the following facetious vein:

"What Noah is to be engaged about, is uncertain. The 'Union' is the fifth or sixth newspaper that Noah has caused to kick the bucket. He is utterly unfit for any newspaper. We really know not what to do with him. He had better set up an old clothes shop at once; we will loan him $50 on the security of the Synagogue to begin. What say, old fellow?"

Next day Mr. Bennett discussed Beach's profitable business of a money changer and shaver of notes, which he referred to as "Beach leaves."

A few days later Beach retorted in a long editorial headed, "Going, Going—Almost Gone," saying:

"The graceless knave who publishes the Herald has but a few steps more to take before he reaches the goal to which he has been speeding ever since he began his infamous career among us. Pecuniary and moral ruin now irretrievably involve him. The Grand Jury has found a true bill of indictment against him for publishing in his obscene print a false and garbled report of the assets of Anthony Dey, Esq. Other indictments will follow on the complaints of other respectable citizens whose business misfortunes have been seized upon by this alien vagabond, as a pretext and excuse for making them the butt of his ribaldry, to tickle the fancy of the depraved into the purchase of his worthless Herald of profanity, blasphemy, obscenity and desecration of character."

To this abusive tirade, Mr. Bennett replied, justifying his handling of the Dey report, and gibbetted Beach in the following paragraph:

"This Beach, one of the most arrant and consummate blockheads ever placed at the head of a newspaper.* * * * The poor devil will have to end his life as he began it, by wielding the jack plane and mending old chairs and tables."

A few days later he again editorially replied to Beach, terming him "the most excruciating blockhead we ever saw!"

CLOSE by where Broadway begins, is the office of a mild little middle-aged man who is one of New York's least known millionaires. Senior head of a huge brokerage house, he sits for five hours a day manoeuvring with some millions of dollars, making money for other people and himself. He lives out in the suburbs; belongs to a score of expensive clubs; and supports anonymously a dozen scholarships that keep young men in college. His wife's monthly allowance is more than the annual income of most New York families. At one time he seriously considered building a winter home down in Miami because his small son caught colds so easily.

By every conceivable material standard, this man is a Stuyvesant—affluent and getting more so.

But he isn't. He smokes cigarettes that cost less than Fatimas. He wouldn't stir for a polo match, but he will motor twenty miles to the Polo Grounds on a scorching midsummer Sunday to see a ball game. Opera makes him restless, but he will sit still all evening listening to a barber shop baritone sing old Irish songs. His original ambition in life was to be a fireman. And he has had a standing five-dollar bet with an elevator man in his office building that Mrs. Blossom is not the mother of Skeezix.

THERE is another middle-aged millionaire in this town whose family is known all over the world. Besides engaging in his own business, he is also an indefatigable worker, director and committeeman in various civic, philanthropic and social organizations in New York. But time after time when our staff cameramen cover the activities of these many organizations, whether the place is the top deck of the Berengaria in the rain or a parlor in the Plaza, this man somehow finds his way into the focus and appears in the film among those reading from left to right. His photographic frequency in THE NEWS is eclipsed only by the President of these United States, Mayor Hylan, and possibly a few of the better known movie stars. . . . We have it on good authority, as the Washington staff men say, that he is one of our most constant Constant Readers.

IT IS extremely illogical—from an advertising standpoint—for such men to act that way. There are scores of exclusive publications which presumably should claim their interests, and in which the advertiser supposedly should have positive contact with their suggestion nerve centers. And yet, dawgonnit, they will read a mass paper like THE NEWS along with 800,000 other more or less common people—the Sweeneys—who buy it every day. The moral seems to be that millionaires like the tabloid size, the larger text, the brief presentation of news, the news pictures, the comic strips and human interest features of THE NEWS as well as other lesser people—and are inclined to pick their newspaper according to their likes rather than their incomes.

This inconsiderate inconsistency on the part of the moneyed classes is so extreme that in the Gold and Purple districts of Manhattan, where family expenditures average from $7,500 to beyond $12,000 a year, THE NEWS has just as many readers per thousand population as it has in many districts where some Sweeneys average less than fifty per. (The figures are available. NEWSPAPER MAKERS AT WORK

WILLIAM P. BEAZELL—A Seeker After Facts

"NEWS boils down to two things.

"First: things you, the reader, hope will happen to you.

"Secondly: things you hope will never happen to you."

This somewhat dogmatic definition of that strange, sought after, hunted, slaved for idol was given me during conversation this week by William Preston Beazell, assistant managing editor of the New York World.

Beazell in calm, deep, well-modulated bass can talk pleasantly for hours. A product of Pittsburgh, where he boxed the newspaper compass even to owning his own publication, he came to New York and worked as a reporter 21 years before appointment to his present position 3 years ago by Herbert Bayard Swope.

"When you read of someone receiving an unexpected inheritance, you know you are interested, hoping or wishing you yourself may some day receive such a gift," Beazell continued, enlarging upon his definition.

"On the other hand, the account of a disaster attracts you, the reader, and the frightened thought crosses your mind 'what if I had been there.'"

But the philosophical newspaper maker was not content with limited definition. Harking back to his Pulitzer training, he resumed conversation.

"One of the chief functions of every newspaper," he declared, "is to go out and see, hear, and experience things for people unable to go out themselves.

"Joseph Pulitzer was the first American journalist to realize this. It is what made him great.

"The furnishing of information to people is the first function of the press. Both opinion and entertainment are secondary.

"I think, of course, that the editorial page is highly important. Certainly there ought to be expressions of opinion and differences of opinion.

"But the highest crime in journalism is to allow opinion to creep into the news columns.

"Newspapers are losing their editorial influence, yes; but they are building up an information service infinitely more helpful than the old editorial system. They are going out and getting the facts on which opinions are based and are giving those facts to the people."

For 27 years Beazell has been searching out facts for people, seeing and experiencing things for them and studying newspapering as a profession.

Son of a clergyman, his whole family has long followed a professional bent, being professors, physicians, lawyers or clergymen. In his boyhood days, Beazell had no thought of becoming a newspaper man. Literally, the nearest he ever came to a newspaper office while a boy was to set up his name in type in a country weekly newspaper office outside of Pittsburgh, his home town.

But, somehow, when he entered the University of Pittsburgh his mind was definitely made up that his profession would be newspapering. At the university, where he spent two years, he was a leading figure in reviving the Courant, the college paper, which had been out of existence about 8 or 10 years. Transferring to Alleghany College he there also took part in college journalism on the Alleghany Campus.

Graduated from Alleghany with the Class of 1897 on his 20th birthday, Beazell got his first newspaper job as reporter on the Chautauqua Assembly Daily Herald, which runs yearly during assembly season, July and August.

In September of the same year, he went back to Pittsburgh and became reporter on the Leader of that city. After 2 years, he transfered to the then Pittsburgh Commercial Gazette, forebear of the present Gazette, where he worked upward to the position of night city editor, when he resigned to write politics on the Pittsburgh Times. In 1906 he went to the Pittsburgh Post as night editor.

Beazell was with the Post not quite a year when he became seriously ill with typhoid fevor, and was in bed for 16 weeks. Recovering he took over the Pittsburgh Index, a society weekly, and later acquired the Pittsburgh Bulletin, a similar publication.

From 1908 to 1910 he owned and edited these two newspapers, and then decided he had had enough of newspaper work. He came to New York in February of the latter year and attained considerable success as a magazine and free lance writer.

Regular newspaper work, however, is hard to give up without struggle, and inside of a few months, Beazell went down to the office of the New York World, where W. A. Johnston, at present the World's suggestion editor, who had tutored him in Greek during college days, gave him work as a reporter. This was March 21, 1910, and Beazell, from inclination, stayed on the street until he was made assistant managing editor; experiencing and informing.

In 1909, the World began to take interest in aviation. That year this newspaper was responsible for the Glenn Curtis flight from Albany to New York. Beazell became one of the first of the World's famous "aviation men." He followed the pioneer flying days carefully, and in 1918 was assigned to cover the army air camps in this country. A series of stories he wrote for the World at this time on "How the United States Is Making an Air Service" won him official commendation from the air service.

Next spring he went to Newfoundland to report the start of the N.C. boats' flight across the Atlantic. He literally helped Alcock and Brown get away on their epoch making non-stop flight to England, working like a navvy. He also reported the Hadley-Page attempt. In all he was in Newfoundland from March until July, 1919.

Another story in which Beazell was on the inside was the Crippen case, a crime story, when wireless was first used in capturing a fugitive from justice. Beazell was the first man to make a survey of traffic conditions in New York.

This was in 1912 and 1913. His series of stories were later published in book form.

DAILIES URGED TO LIMIT MERCHANDISING CO-OPERATION GIVEN ADVERTISERS

By M. D. HUNTON
Cone, Hunton & Woodman

A QUESTION of increasing importance with newspaper publishers is "How far shall we go in extending co-operation to national advertisers?" It is a matter of interest to advertisers also, for it has a kick-back to them.

M. D. HUNTON

From the newspaper standpoint a certain amount of co-operation is desirable. It gives the national advertiser something which no other medium can offer, and it adds an interest in the newspaper columns to local merchants who may increase their space somewhat by tie-up copy. But co-operation has been and is an increasing expense, and since the milline rate in newspapers has advanced only slightly and not at all comparably to production costs, co-operation means doing business with the advertiser on a reduced margin of profit. It is therefore necessary for the newspaper to limit the expense of co-operation to a point where the margin of profit does not entirely disappear.

Competition between newspapers has been so strong that many of them have emphasized their "Merchandising Departments" (a misnomer, by the way, for a newspaper is not a merchant and should not be a personal solicitor of orders) rather than their circulations. Of course the advertiser is keen to get all he can for his money and frequently plays the promises of co-operation by one newspaper against those of another newspaper losing sight of circulation. In this kind of a contest the weaker newspaper in its anxiety for business may promise more than its stronger contemporary (which promise it often cannot fulfill) and get away with the bacon. When it does the advertiser has bought co-operation instead of circulation, and the unsatisfactory returns that usually follow react against both the weaker newspaper and advertising in general.

There are a number of kinds of legitimate co-operation being given newspapers: (1) A preliminary survey and report of the market for the advertisers' goods, showing relative sales of competing articles and opportunity for the advertiser. (2) Putting the advertiser in touch with or introducing his representatives to distributors. (3) Conferring with the advertiser's salesmen as to the retail houses and furnishing them route-lists. (4) Advising retailers in the trade area of the size and character of the impending advertising campaign, the cost of printed matter and postage being borne by the advertiser. (5) Arranging for the distribution of posters, cards, etc. in retail stores, the expense of which should be borne by the advertiser. (6) Securing counter and window displays by dealers. (7) Giving the advertising publicity in a house organ or trade paper, if one is issued by the newspaper. (8) Securing dealer tie-up advertising. (9) Reporting a check-up on sales of goods during and after the campaign. In all conscience, these are enough helps at existing rates. It would be an excellent thing if co-operation could be standardized by newspapers generally. It is probably impracticable to do this throughout the country but it is feasible for the newspapers in each city to get together and agree on the extent of the co-operation which any of them will give.

From the advertiser's standpoint circulation should be the main consideration in selecting a medium and co-operation an afterthought. It is a big mistake to lose sight of the fundamental basis of advertising value, which is the amount and character of circulation and cost per thousand readers reached. No amount of co-operation, and it might be added no character of good copy, can compensate for this lack. The best co-operation in the world is only an aid to putting goods on the dealers' shelves. Creating the desire in the consumer's mind to buy those goods can be accomplished only through the publicity the newspaper columns give.

To ask increasing or unusual co-operation from newspapers means additional expense to them, and if persisted in will finally find expression in increased cost in what is now one of the relatively cheapest thing in the commercial world—newspapers' milline rates.

From the standpoint of both newspaper and advertisers it is therefore desirable to put a limit on co-operation.

It is up to the newspapers to begin doing so.

Hundreds stand in line in Philadelphia to buy the Sunday Transcript. This is not true as to any other publication on earth. Seventy-five years without soliciting an advertisement.

LENT HEADS NEW JERSEY PRESS

R. E. Lent, general manager of the Passaic (N. J.) News, was elected president of the New Jersey Press Association at its 68th annual meeting just closed at South Mountain Manor, Wernersville, Pa.

Mr. Lent served last year as vice-president. The out-going president is John E. Clarey, of the Madison Eagle. The new vice-president is F. A. Robertson, of the Washington Star. The association's two veteran officers, W. B. R. Mason of the Bound Brook Chronicle and John W. Clift of the Summit Herald, were re-elected treasurer and secretary respectively. The new executive committee consists of William B. Bryant, Paterson Press-Guardian; Edmund W. Carpenter, Woodbury Democrat; Charles H. Frost, Plainfield Courier-News; E. V. Savidge, Hopewell Herald; George C. Ladd, Vineland Journal; and W. A. Haffert, Cape May Times.

After minor amendment, a code of ethics for the newspaper profession in New Jersey, proposed at the winter conference in Trenton, was adopted as follows:

To consider first the interests of the public.

To maintain secrecy as to the source of news or news information given in good faith when requested or understood by the informant.

Never deliberately misrepresent or pervert facts.

To eliminate, insofar as possible, personal opinions from news columns, but be leaders of thought in editorial columns and make criticisms constructive.

To strive constantly to eliminate free reading notices and to keep reading columns independent of advertising consideration.

To decline any advertisement which has a tendency to mislead, or which does not conform to business integrity.

To solicit subscriptions and advertising solely upon the merits of the newspaper.

To supply advertisers with full information regarding character and extent of circulation, including detailed circulation statements.

To give proper credit for articles taken from other newspapers or publications, and to avoid unfair practices in competition with them.

Press and Welfare Work

"The enormous service rendered by daily newspapers in promoting welfare work of various kinds is beyond the comprehension of the average person, even those who are directly engaged in such work. There is no doubt that the value of this service throughout the country could be counted by millions of dollars annually.—Charles Stelzle, before Biennial Nursing Convention.

SMALL WANT AD BILLS NO LONGER WORRY

Mathews, Business Manager of Santa Barbara Press, Solves Problem of Collection by Brief and Pointed Letter

So, at least, claims W. R. Mathews, business manager of the Santa Barbara (Cal.) Morning Press, who submits to EDITOR & PUBLISHER as proof a letter which he claims has been used with remarkable success.

"In so many cases the charges are so small that many people overlook them altogether," Mathews writes. "Here, we have tried several different methods of collecting these charges. We have tried sending collectors with them to each house, but that did not prove satisfactory because a great many people do not like to be bothered with collectors, especially when the charge is small; too, often the party called upon is not at home; and as a result the cost of collecting these charges with a collector is very expensive.

"We have tried mailing out ordinary 'duns' with a balance due marked on them and, of course, this brought in a few. Last month we hit upon a scheme that has surprised us beyond all measure with results and we believe it is good enough for you to pass on to other papers who have a similar problem to solve.

"When a phoned-in want ad is run we mail out the bill the next day and in about 20 per cent of the cases the people will send the money for these first bills. If the money does not come in from that bill on the fifteenth of the following month, we send out the following letter:

"DEAR FRIEND:

No doubt you have overlooked sending us a check for the small bill noted below. The matter of ——— is of small moment to most people; it is probably to you, but when several thousand small amounts similar to it are outstanding it becomes a hard problem to solve.

Thank you.

CLASSIFIED AD DEPT.,
The Morning Press."

"One of the best things about this particular letter is that we have not had one complaint from anybody about it being a 'dun' or 'don't you think our credit is good,' 'What's the matter—do you need the money that badly' and all the other various well-known complaints that usually come from collection letters," Mathews concludes.

Industries Growing in the SOUTHERN STATES

The South's rapid strides in the development of her manufactures is a story of an expanding manufacturing industry at home to utilize locally produced raw materials.

During the past twenty years the geographic center of cotton manufacturing has shifted from New England to the South.

Southern mills are now consuming nearly 60 per cent of all cotton used in American plants. The number of spindles in its cotton mills has increased from 4,500,000 to nearly 15,700,000.

The swift development as shown in the cotton spinning industry, is also true of what is taking place in other lines of trade.

This great South has also turned to the manufacturing of her metals, the refining of her petroleum, making of coke, and utilizing her own timber in her own shipbuilding plants.

The total value of manufactured products in the South, as stated by the Census, is in excess of $9,800,000,000.

The South, rich in tradition, rich in natural resources, rich in industries, is now developing faster, and progressing more rapidly than any other part of our land.

The market is here, the money is here. These Southern newspapers, realizing that through the expansion of their own communities they increase their own scope, invite National Advertisers to come South with their goods.

WASHINGTON STAR INAUGURATES NEW SAVINGS PLAN FOR STAFF

Daily Proposed to Add 50 Per Cent to Amount of Employes Deposits — Plan Outlined by Publisher Frank B. Noyes

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 24.—The Washington Evening Star, a newspaper that spends approximately $175,000 annually in employes' pensions, disability and death benefits, holiday bonuses and visiting nurses for its workers, has announced the establishment of a Staff Savings Fund, by which the newspaper proposes to add 50 per cent. to the amount of its employes' savings, providing the regulations of the fund are carried out. In a recent announcement of the fund, Frank B. Noyes publisher of the Star said:

FRANK B. NOYES

"The plan is patterned largely on that of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company which has been in extraordinarily successful operation nearly 25 years. It is designed to encourage persistence in savings and persistence in employment in the company's service."

The main features of the plan as outlined by Mr. Noyes are: Each employe (with certain exceptions) is allowed to deposit with the Evening Star Staff Savings Fund each year an amount not exceeding 5 per cent of his annual salary, the total deposits as nearly as practicable, being invested in interest bearing securities selected by the trustees of the fund.

Provision is made so that the entire savings with the accumulated earnings may be drawn out on notice by the depositor but a penalty is exacted if the account is reopened. Partial withdrawals are not permitted. A depositor thus, is able to withdraw what he has put in, with larger interest than if deposited in a savings bank, but he does not receive the 50 per cent contribution of the Star Company offered for persistence in savings and employment.

For those who persist in the savings and in employment on the Star the company adds 50 per cent of the amount of the savings, which with interest on these additions will be paid to depositors or their legal representatives, on the death of the depositor; in the event of permanent incapacity of a depositor; on the honorable retirement from the company's employ after a service of 20 years, and within the discretion of the trustees in certain contingencies.

"An interesting phase of the plan," said Mr. Noyes, "is that the company's contributions made on account of depositors who prematurely withdraw their savings are with certain exceptions credited to the accounts of those who persist in saving and employment.

"Under the present conditions the trustees of this fund should be able to invest safely the deposits so that a return of from 5 to 6 per cent interest can be obtained. If a depositor save $10 monthly the following table shows the magic of compound interest at both 5 and 6 per cent:

	5%	6%	Principal Paid
Balance end 5 years	$681.97	$699.84	$600.00
Balance end 10 years	1,554.95	1,640.27	1,200.00
Balance end 15 years	2,672.45	2,904.05	1,800.00
Balance end 20 years	4,102.93	4,602.63	2,400.00
Balance end 25 years	5,934.07	6,885.38	3,000.00
Balance end 30 years	8,278.08	9,953.20	3,600.00
Balance end 35 years	11,278.61	14,076.03	4,200.00
Balance end 40 years	15,119.55	19,046.12	4,800.00
Balance end 45 years	20,036.28	27,063.11	5,400.00

"Half as much (50 per cent) is to be added by reason of the company's contribution, thus it will be seen that through these two sources if 5 per cent is earned the $10 monthly saving will amount in 25 years to more than $7,800 of which the depositor has contributed $3,000. In 45 years—and that is not an uncommon term of employment by the Star—the credit would amount to over $30,000 of which the depositor would have contributed $5,400. If six per cent is earned throughout the credit in 25 years would be more than $10,300 and 45 years $40,500."

In his letter to the employes of the Star announcing the plan Mr. Noyes speaking as fellow member of the Star family said he would like to say a few words concerning the Company they all served.

"Familiar as I am," continued Mr. Noyes, "with the different beneficial activities authorized by the Company, I am free to say that I did not realize the aggregate to which these benefits amount, until I recently added them up.

"The Pension System, Disability Benefits, Death Benefits, Holiday Bonus, Vacations, Visiting Nurse and the new Savings Fund if fully availed of require an annual contribution by the Company of approximately $175,000 in addition to the regular payroll.

"This amount does not take into consideration the rental valu eof the space used for the Club Room and the Dental Clinic nor the clerical work incident to the savings and other plans. The Company also has aided 52 employes to purchase homes by making loans to them at low interest rates.

His Hobby is Collecting Howard Pyle Illustrations

"On a Friday Afternoon"

HERE'S a tip which may make you rich.

If you know a bird who possesses a book containing a Howard Pyle illustration, just sneak up to him and say, offhand like, "What'll you take for it?" He'll probably reply, unless he is in on this secret, "Oh, it's an old book—I'll sell it for six bits."

HERB ROTH

You make the trade and then fetch it to the Pulitzer Building, New York, and stroll into the Sunday art department and ask for Herb Roth. That gentleman will seize the copy like a Maine pickerel goes after a shiner

Herb Roth, cartoon genius of the New York Sunday World, creator of a thousand drolleries in pen and ink sketch, has the world's finest collection of Howard Pyle's illustrations. We happen to know that he paid $250 for a complete de luxe edition of Hawthorne just to get one book which contained a Howard Pyle picture.

Herb Roth hails from San Francisco. He was born there in 1887. His father was a sculptor. Young Roth was educated at the San Francisco Polytechnic, the same school which graduated Hype Igoe of the World, "Tad" of the New York Journal, Paul Terry and other newspaper cartoonists.

In the capacity of office boy for the San Francisco Bulletin, Roth had his first glimpse of newspaper work. This close-up picture of reporters at work convinced him he ought to be a cartoonist, and in 5 years his work was appearing on the Bulletin editorial page.

Roth lost his job temporarily during the earthquake and fire of 1906, but was reinstated when an inquisitive reporter found him philosophically viewing the ruins of the city from a refugee tent.

In 1910, he came to New York and joined the World's Sunday department. Roth likes to work for a certain period, then knocks off for several months and travel. He has made sketching tours in all parts of the world.

VALUABLE SERVICE

A NOTABLE achievement has been gained for the press in general through the determined attitude of Boston Evening Transcript in resisting the legal proposition of the state that a newspaper must accept and publish advertisements.

The full bench of the Supreme Court, as previously reported in EDITOR & PUBLISHER, has sustained the exceptions of the Transcript in connection with the criminal charge of failing to comply with a request of the Minimum Wage Commission to publish, at its regular rates, a notice rendered by it. This concerned a store where, it was alleged, women employes were unfairly paid. The Transcript declined the matter.

The court ruled that the following sections of the general laws were invalid, in that they compel a publisher to print matter which to him seems libelous:

"Section 12—Any newspaper refusing or neglecting to publish the findings, decrees or notices of the commission at its regular rates for the space shall be punished by a fine of not less than $100."

"Section 13—No member of the commission, and no newspaper publisher, proprietor or editor or employe thereof, shall be liable for damages for publishing the name of any employer as provided for in this chapter, unless such publication contains some wilful misrepresentation."

Chief Justice Rugg said that the only question to be decided was whether the mandatory terms of the statute violates the rights secured to the defendants by the Constitution:

He pointed out: "The effect of the statute is to compel the publisher of any newspaper, selected by the public board established by the statute, to print the matter offered by that board in accordance with the statute, at the rate specified in the statute. He cannot negotiate as to the rate he will charge. * * *

"It may not be for his business advantage so to print it. He may not want to print it at any price. His preferences, desires or financial advantage or detriment are entitled to no consideration under the statute. * * * Its fair market value, regarded as space occupied, may be much greater than the price commonly charged for business advertisements of the usual character. * * *

"The protection afforded to the publisher against liability for libelous publications made pursuant to the statute is of uncertain nature. The constitutional power of the Legislature to deprive one altogether of his right of action against the publisher of a libel may well be open to doubt. The right of speedy remedy for injuries or wrongs to character is established on the same footing as injuries or wrongs to persons and property."

That rasping sound you hear in the distance is caused by the press agents of the several political machines dredging up from the bottom of plausability reasons for party preference.

YE EDITOR'S VACATION

WHEN Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr., left recently for his summer vacation, he saluted the readers of his tabloid newspapers at San Francisco and Los Angeles in these terms: "This is vacation time and this evening your publisher begins his vacation. Our first stop will be Seattle. Five years ago, your publisher was a cub reporter on an evening paper there. Today the man for whom he worked is working for him as business manager of the San Francisco Illustrated Daily Herald."

All of which moved R. F. Paine, the veteran hard-hitting editor of the Scripps-Howard organization, to poetry, as follows:

"Time at last sets all things even,
And, if we do but watch the hour,
There never yet was human power
Which could evade, if unforgiven,
The patient search and vigil long
Of him who treasures up a cub reporter's wrong."

A frequent caller is the young woman journalist who immediately expresses scorn of "society columns" and "women's pages" and wants a job as a "regular reporter." But the great work that women have to do in newspaper offices is to expertly cater to the interests of women.

CHAPTER XIII. 1

Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal.

STAR FAMILY UNITY

YOU see in another column the latest beneficent enterprise of the Washington Evening Star in behalf of the employes of that great newspaper. We do not know of another newspaper in America which is more solicitous of the welfare of the men who make the paper, day by day. Frank B. Noyes and his associates practise these methods because of elements of heart and soul. Star family ties are strong and enduring. It is a matter worthy of the highest commendation. Those who "let live," themselves live best in this best of possible worlds.

The Hearst idea in newspapering sweeps on, every week witnessing a new development, or a complete new unit in that huge journalistic enterprise.

RELATIVE PRIDE

THERE may be other sports and forms of angling comparable to fly-fishing for trout, but if so, I have never indulged in them or met one who has," says O. W. Smith, Wisconsin philosopher.

Have you ever cast a net for an exclusive interview with the leading character in the day's biggest news plot? No speckled trout ever laid on the mossy bottom of an angler's basket can compare for beauty and pride to the angler with the "important interview" when it is safely in print.

A competent advertising man not only knows advertising is his own paper, but advertising in general. He is an expert in advertising methods and values. The day is gone for the advertising man who only knows he wants some copy.

DOG-DAY READING

MEET the new master. No longer does the banker or the big retail merchant snap the blacksnake thong round the newspaper publisher's calves. They are as out of date as the Simon Legree of Mrs. Stowe. The new Imperial Wizard is the press agent. Take that from Roy McCardell, known to thousands as a newspaper humorist, now a gun-pointer in the magazines' battery of propaganda to discredit the newspaper as an information agency worthy of public confidence.

Mr. McCardell is more subtle than his fellow-author for the Saturday Evening Post, Mr. Turner, who frankly uses fiction to picture the press agent's place in modern journalism. Mr. McCardell arms his projectiles with statistics and writes of "the facts." He gives the "more than two and a quarter million" the real "lowdown" on journalism. Reporters—there "ain't no sech animile." Country weeklies—likewise extinct. Individual ownership and control—no hope—all of the 2,036 daily and Sunday papers—Mr. McCardell's figures—are either controlled by one of the 105 chain ownerships or buy from them all their news, opinions and entertainment. New York has only eleven regular daily newspapers—or had when Mr. McCardell wrote his piece 60 or 90 days before it appeared. He couldn't know, of course, that its appearance would be simultaneous with that of two New York dailies and that two more were on the ways.

It's hardly worth while to refute seriatim these curious pronouncements, nor to quarrel with Mr. Will Irwin's suggestion in Collier's that we are coming to a national journalism like that of Europe, nor with the oracular, if hastily formed, conclusions of writers for the Atlantic Monthly and the American Mercury.

From the sidelines, they all evidence a market created by green-eyed jealousy of the present prosperity of newspapers, not a little of which has been transferred from magazine cash-drawers by advertisers who burned their fingers at the magazines' torch.

The newspapers can't be undermined that way, but it is interesting to watch the progress of the campaign. The yarns make good hot-weather reading, their proceeds buy new cars for the newspaper men who know a good market for a few hours' work and EDITOR & PUBLISHER gets an occasional editorial hunch for a week of dull news. Let the parade go on!

It's what you don't know that hurts you.

FRUITS OF CENSORSHIP

THE inevitable has happened in Italy. We know, if we know anything from experience, that when press despatches are labeled "delayed," "deleted," "passed by censor," "Rome via Paris, delayed," etc., that some ruthless dictator is getting in his bloody work for some minority against some majority.

We knew, when we learned that Mussolini, who gained his autocratic power in the uniform of an altruist, had muzzled the press of his country through insolent laws wholly in defiance of the principle of free press and public understanding of public business, that such unnatural protection of individuals in power would lead to license. Behold, it brings forth one of the most atrocious murders of a public official in modern history and revolution and wholesale slaughter of the innocents is, perhaps, only narrowly averted.

Mussolini muzzled the press of his country because he couldn't stand the truth. It is the first act of a dictator, always from the same cause. His program is one of brutal control. His power is through prejudice and fear and exists because the public is uninformed.

There appears to be persistent general faith in the principle that a new publication should walk into public favor on the legs of a burlesque queen. Each new publishing venture coming to our desk in recent weeks has presented a fresh array of more or less threadbare feminine pulchritude.

FOLKS WORTH KNOWING

FOR 34 years, Walter C. Johnson, general manager of the Chattanooga (Tenn.) News, has seen continuous service with daily newspapers.

W. C. JOHNSON

From newsboy on Macon, Atlanta, Ga., and Knoxville, Tenn., newspapers, Johnson graduated into the printers' devil class on the Knoxville Sentinel. With that newspaper he advanced through all the various business office departments finally becoming book-keeper and cashier. Afterwards he served in the same capacity on the old Knoxville Tribune under its joint ownership with the Sentinel.

In 1902, Johnson began collecting more imposing titles, being appointed in that year secretary-treasurer of the Memphis Morning News. He held this office for 4 years, when, shortly after the consolidation of the News and the Memphis Evening Scimitar, he was made business manager of the combined daily, the News-Scimitar.

For 5 years he remained at this position, and then, in 1907, he was induced by J. B. Pound, publisher of the Chattanooga News to come to Chattanooga and be general manager of that newspaper.

Two years later, he became associated with George F. Milton and C. B. Johnson in the purchase of the Chattanooga News, becoming vice-president and general manager of that newspaper.

Johnson has been very active in the work of the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association. He was elected vice-president and served for two terms, and in 1916 was elected secretary-treasurer, having been re-elected to the latter office every year since.

FAMED TRAVEL WRITER DIES IN SHANGHAI

Frank Carpenter, Newspaper Man, "Made Geography Interesting"—Called Father of Syndicate Writing—45 Years in Field

Frank G. Carpenter, "the newspaper man who made geography interesting," has covered his last travel assignment. Death overtook Carpenter in Shanghai, June 18, while he was making another extensive tour of the Orient to interest readers the world over with his informing and graphic stories of strange and far off places.

Although his death came as a shock to those who knew him and knew that he expected to go on for several years more writing the kind of news feature sketches that made him famous. In Washington, where Carpenter had served as correspondent before he took up the writing of travels, his passing caused genuine sorrow.

Carpenter, who was 69, has been called the father of the American news syndicate. He has been writing steadily for 45 years and for nearly half that time articles have appeared daily in a group of the largest American newspapers. His death caught him on his third trip around the world with particular attention to the Philippines, China, Japan and Korea for the final volumes of the complete story of his journeys published under the title of "Carpenter's World Travels." Ten volumes, or half the series already have been published.

He was born in Manfield, Ohio, May 8, 1855 and was graduated from Wooster University in 1877, engaging immediately in newspaper work. In 1879 he was made Columbus correspondent for the Cleveland Leader and later came to Washington for that paper. His dispatches signed "Carp" written in an intimate style formed something new in American journalism and he was widely quoted. He started on his travels when young as the result of a warning from his physician that he had only a short time to live. Reasoning that he might as well see something before the end came he made a trip to Egypt, and in defiance of the doctor's prediction continued to travel and write for nearly a half century.

Frank Carpenter always considered Washington his home and he had summer residence at Bluemont, Va., not far from the capital. While in Washington he occupied a suite of rooms that once was the home of Mark Hanna. He was a member of the original Gridiron Club, a life member of the National Geographic Society and a fellow of the Royal Geographic Society.

Do you remember way back when Lilly's Undertaking Parlors occupied a small store room on Sixth Avenue? This notable institution has kept pace with progress and faith with the public.

Today Lilly's beautiful funeral home is the result of Lilly Service. It is the greatest institution of its kind in Iowa.

An undertaking establishment would seem to be among the few that really are "different." As the facts below show, however, the same treatment that brings buyers for other services or commodities has proved effective in this field.

Getting Results for a "Different" Business

Lilly Brothers, who conduct a fine funeral home in Des Moines, Iowa, decided that their business was not adapted to advertising. As an experiment however, they consented to try rotogravure in the belief that pictures would tell the story. That was over a year ago, and they have continued to use space regularly in rotogravure ever since. They definitely state that rotogravure has given them more high-grade publicity in a short two years than they could have secured through ordinary channels in ten years, and that they will adopt the use of rotogravure as a part of their business policy hereafter. They use about four thousand lines a year.

Advertisers or advertising agencies with a "different" business will find interesting material in the 68-page book, "Rotogravure, How and When to Use It." Sent free on request to Kimberly-Clark Company, Neenah, Wisconsin.

"AS YOU WOULD SEE IT IF YOU WERE THERE"

WHAT'S WHAT IN THE FEATURE FIELD

WINSOR McCAY

McCay has been with the Hearst newspapers since 1911, drawing political and editorial cartoons.

Thousands of people had written him asking that he revive Little Nemo and McCay himself had long been anxious to return to that work. Until the merger of the New York Herald and Tribune this was impossible, the Herald holding the copyright and refusing to let it be used elsewhere.

Before going to the Hearst organization, McCay had been 8 years with the Herald. Before that he was with the Cincinnati Enquirer and previously with the Cincinnati Commercial Tribune.

"Little Nemo," McCay's best known feature, grew out of an earlier comic of his called the "Dreams of a Rarebit Fiend." Other of his better known creations are "Poor Jake," "Dull Care," "Hungry Henrietta," "Sammy Sneeze," and "Tales of the Jungle Imps."

"SO long as a newspaper syndicate creates and develops new and worth while talent, just so long it is useful and helpful to the newspaper world. But its reason for being surely stops there."

H. H. McCLURE

This is the opinion of H. H. McClure, general manager of the Associated Newspapers, New York, who in a recent statement to clients takes up the discussion of syndicate methods by the American Society of Newspaper Editors as contained in EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

McClure in this statement expresses himself in accord with the A. S. N. E. findings that "the present day newspaper syndicates, while being of much service, are to be blamed for many evils."

"Everyone knows," he declares, "that the original idea and purpose of the newspaper syndicate was to furnish reading and picture material to newspapers in non-conflicting territory at a lower cost than such material would be for one paper alone, or even for a small group of papers.

"And everyone in the newspaper business knows that this is no longer done.

"Worth while features now cost the newspapers in such cities as New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, etc., more than they should cost the entire syndicate list. Proportionately the evil extends to every newspaper buying features," he maintains.

McClure blames the newspapers mainly for this condition for "permitting the syndicate Frankensteins to create their monsters."

"There is no doubt but that the feature business would be much improved if some of the 'oriental price-jackers' were eliminated," he says.

"When a syndicate operates only on the plan of taking established talent away from another organization and making the publisher pay steadily increasing prices for this talent, then it becomes a menace.

"There are now several syndicates which have not discovered or created a single feature which they are placing—everyone has been 'bid' away from some one else, and the newspaper publishers have held the bag. I am not saying that a feature may not be better placed and handled by one organization than another, but I do claim that the so-called better organization ought to do some creative work, in order to acquire merit in the eyes of the publishers."

Harry King Tootle, associate editor, King Features Syndicate has been transferred to the post of promotion manager, succeeding the late C. M. Sheridan. Floyd McGriff, manager of Cosmopolitan News Service until its absorption by International News Service recently, succeeds Tootle as associate editor of King Features. McGriff has been in newspaper work for 12 years. He reorganized International News Service in Ohio during 1917, was London correspondent for that organization 1918-1920, was one of its political reporters in 1920 attached to Harding headquarters during the presidential campaign.

Frank H. Beck, cartoonist, who draws "Gas Buggies," a comic strip, and "Down the Road," a weekly automobile cartoon for the Metropolitan Newspaper Service, New York, surprised friends last week by announcing that he was quietly married May 19, to Miss Marian E. Schwarz of New York. Miss Schwarz was formerly private secretary to Richard Washburn Child, former Ambassador to Italy. Mr. and Mrs. Beck are spending the summer at Canaan, Conn.

Herbert S. Kamsler, with the Herald-Sun Syndicate, New York, prior to its sale to the New York Tribune, and more recently associated with the Washington bureau of the Consolidated Press Association, has resigned to engage in feature syndicate work in New York.

Science Service, Washington, announces a new sort of feature. "Cartoon-o-graphs," illustrated statistics, vitalizing official data upon manufacturing, agriculture, business, education, health and other important topics.

HERMINE NEUSTADTL

The arrangement also includes control of "How It Started," written originally for the New York Evening World, and later, under the title "It Happened Thus" for the New York Sun.

Miss Neustadtl has been with the Review of Reviews, was at one time fiction editor of Harper's Bazaar, and more recently was managing editor of the Quality Newspaper Feature Service.

North American Newspaper Alliance, New York, claims its working agreement with the American Medical Association, represents the first group action to improve newspaper medical stories that has been taken by the American press.

Hazel Deyo Batchelor has written a new serial, "The Second Mrs. Strong" for the Ledger Syndicate, Philadelphia. Mrs. Batchelor is author also of "The Married Life" which ran continuously for 4 years in the New York Journal. For the past 5 years she has written exclusively for the Philadelphia Evening Public Ledger and the Ledger Syndicate..

Robert Sidney Smith, son of the creator of the Gump cartoons, is showing ability writing serious and comic verse. Selections from his pen appear in the June issue of Trib, the Chicago Tribune office paper.

MACFADDEN TABLOID TO APPEAR IN FALL

Evening Daily Will Feature True Story and Physical Culture Material—Gauvreau, Hartford Courant, Managing Editor

Bernarr Macfadden's New York daily tabloid newspaper will definitely make its appearance this fall, EDITOR & PUBLISHER was informed this week.

As reported previously in this paper, the tabloid will be an illustrated evening publication.

The physical culturist refuses to discuss detailed plans. He declines to announce the name of the tabloid.

It is known, however, that Emile Gauvreau, managing editor of the Hartford Courant, has been appointed to take that position on the Macfadden tabloid, and is now engaging a staff. Mr. Macfadden himself will probably be editor of the paper, while it is understood that Fulton Oursler, now supervising editor of the Macfadden publications will be executive editor.

Macfadden, according to an EDITOR & PUBLISHER informant, has purchased the plant of the old New York Evening Mail for use in publishing the tabloid, his first venture in the daily field.

It is understood the new journal will not strive to compete with other New York newspapers in the presentation of news. The Macfadden plans are said to call for an entirely new angle in newspapering, featuring material along the lines now followed in Physical Culture and True Stories, two Macfadden publications. It will probably run 32 pages.

Coincident with information regarding the proposed daily newspaper, definite announcement was made that Macfadden Publications, Inc., will start publication of Radio Stories, a monthly, commencing with the October issue.

This new magazine, the tenth in the Macfadden chain, will cover the radio field from the human interest angle, according to the publisher. It will include articles, interviews, and photographs of radio stars and personalities. The page size will have 3 columns of 143 lines each.

Walter Hanlon is advertising manager. He has been with the Macfadden Publications, Inc., on the staff of True Story. The other Macfadden publications are Physical Culture, True Stories, Metropolitan, True Romances, Dream World, Movie Weekly, Dance Lovers, True Detective Mysteries and Muscle Builder.

Consider This Tremendous Purchasing Power

Pennsylvania ranking 32d in area, is second in population, second in income, manufactures, wealth and nearly every other attribute.

Pennsylvania leads all states in combined mineral and industrial production. Latest reports show anthracite coal output at 86,200,000 tons, bituminous output at 145,000,000 tons, worth together, about $900,000,000.

Pennsylvania has more than 27,000 industrial establishments, employing 1,324,121 workers, paying $1,406,463,000 in wages, $334,763,000 in salaries, using $6,177,729,000 of capital and producing over $7,300,000,000 of manufactured products.

Added to these enormous figures in Pennsylvania's wealth, is an investment of more than $2,250,000,000 represented in her farms, producing more than $500,000,000 in crops. Production is varied in all parts of the state. The crops are spread evenly through the whole list, with large diversification and consequent steadiness of prosperity.

THE Davenport (Ia.) Democrat, celebrated its 69th anniversary June 14, by moving into its new $250,000 building. Frank D. Throop, editor and publisher, invited newspaper publishers of the middle west to visit the building. Mr. Throop started with the Democrat twenty-two years ago as a printers' devil.

The new plant is housed in a building containing 2 stories and a mezzanine floor, constructed of reinforced concrete, structural steel, brick, stone, gypsum, and terra cotta.

Business offices are located on the main floor in a large lobby with U-shaped marble-topped mahogany counter. Walls are treated in stone-kote cement plaster marked into blocks in the natural color, with ornamental plaster ceiling. Floors are of half-inch cork.

On the first floor are also the offices of the publisher and circulation manager, with the press and mailing rooms in the rear. A Goss high speed straightline three-deck sextuple press is used.

Editorial rooms with private offices for the managing editor, city, society and telegraph editors occupy the front part of the second floor. Reporters have desks in a room 24 by 32 feet in size.

The most modern type of mechanical equipment is used in the composing room, opening from the editorial department, which contains partitioned offices for the foreman and proof readers. There are 8 linotype machines with space for 8 additional machines; 32 turtles; and a complete steel equipment. The roof is of a saw-tooth construction, of gypsum tile, affording the maximum of light and ventilation. The Democrat building is the only newspaper plant in Iowa with light and ventilation on 3 sides.

The stereotype room occupies a space 24 by 44 feet in the rear end of the second floor, separated from the composing room by wash rooms and store room,

The floor of the composing room is of blocks-on-end construction; that of the stereo room of one-quarter inch steel plates. A circular staircase leads from the stereo room to the press room.

The Democrat was founded in 1855 by Richardson, Hildreth & West, and for 55 consecutive years has occupied quarters at 218 Main street. It is the oldest paper in Davenport and one of the oldest in Iowa.

WHAT THEY ARE SAYING

NEWSPAPERS MUST BE SALABLE

"THE first requisite of a newspaper is that it be salable. It may be superfine from every ethical, intellectual and educative standpoint, but if it is not salable it is without value. For whatever the purpose of its production, however high the motives that prompt its creation, that purpose cannot be accomplished unless it has readers, and it will not have readers unless it continuously supplies news that interests them and that sufficiently induces them to buy."—Casper S. Yost, Editor of the Editorial Page, St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

WHO IS TO BLAME?

"WHO is to blame for the bad newspapers, the press or the people? To make money, the newspaper owners give the people the bad papers they think they want and they seem to want them. Both are to blame. The solution is not in turning out all the editors or in requiring people by law to read good newspapers. The only answer is better education for the people so that they will demand and insist upon getting better ones. When the people arise in their might and fight for good journalism it will be provided."—Bruce Bliven, of the New Republic, former managing editor, New York Globe.

WHO PAYS FOR ADVERTISING?

"WHO pays for advertising? I'll tell you. The one who pays the factory rent; the one who pays for the machinery used in the factory; the one who pays for packing the goods; the one who pays distribution costs; the one who pays the salesman's commissions and expenses; the one who pays the profits of manufacturer, jobber, retailer; the one who pays the uncollected accounts of all three; the one who pays all the cost of every kind connected with production, distribution and selling, makes up business losses, pays business profits and complains more about the cost of advertising than all the other overhead items combined. The consumer. But it is his investment and it brings him rich returns."—Walter Sammis, Business Department, New York Times, before advertising department of New York State Publishers' Association, Gloversville, N. Y.

"BUNK" ADVERTISING A BOOMERANG

"ADVERTISING that aims to 'bunk' the public always proves a boomerang to the advertised article. Barnum got famous by stating that the public liked to be humbugged, yet there was not one Barnum & Bailey circus that did not give value tenfold to the entertainment-seeker for the price of admission. Advertising can change public opinion, make a corporation saintly to the public which once thought it despicable, as witness the case of the packers of Chicago. Some persons actually believe they don't read advertisements in the newspapers. They assert that advertising doesn't influence their buying. Yet it is most likely nearly every article of clothing they wear is a widely advertised one and from morning till night they are eating, employing or otherwise using advertised articles."—Emil Brisacher, San Francisco.

ADVERTISING NOT AN EXTRA COST

"IN some minds the idea prevails that advertising is an extra cost added to the expense of the product. Were that theory right, the whole scheme of advertising would vanish like mist before the blazing sun. Advertising would never have existed. If we build an expensive plant, installing proper machinery, and manufacture only 50 tires per day, what would be the cost of those tires? The price would be prohibitive. On the other hand, if we create a demand that enables us to manufacture thousands of tires and tubes daily, we are then able to price those tires in direct inverse ratio to quantity. Advertising invariably lowers the cost of goods if they are dependable goods."—Harvey S. Firestone.

SHORTHAND IN REPORTING

"A KNOWLEDGE of shorthand," says EDITOR & PUBLISHER, "is one of the most valuable accomplishments of a reporter, all statements to the contrary notwithstanding. It is important to quote people correctly and the shorthand reporter, not ashamed to use his book and pencil, usually turns out the best story." A few newspapers, it may be noted, already are paying bonuses to reporters who learn shorthand, and the day is not far distant when shorthand will be as much a necessity in this country as it is in England. Absolute accuracy is the ideal of every newspaper. But we are a long way from that ideal. Use of shorthand by every reporter will be a step toward it.—The Washington Newspaper.

TEXAS PRESS ELECTS LUKER PRESIDENT

Association to Handle Its Own Advertising Hereafter—Country Weekly League Formed—Wells Heads Panhandle Group

AMARILLO, Tex., June 20.—The Texas Press Association, in its annual session here, June 18-20, by unanimous vote decided to organize within its membership a Texas Country Weekly Press League to handle the national and other advertising of the league members and to conduct an extensive publicity campaign to acquaint advertisers more thoroughly with Texas as a field for the profitable advertising of nationally marketed products.

A committee of 5 will be appointed by the incoming president to study and formulate plans of organization and management.

A. H. Luker, of the Grapeland Messenger was elected president; Will A. Smith, San Saba News, vice-president; Sam P. Harben, Richardson Echo, secretary; Fred H. Lehman, San Antonio, treasurer.

Except for routine business and addresses on technical subjects, most of the session was devoted to discussions of the problems of obtaining national advertising on a profitable basis without paying exorbitant commissions.

Emmett Finley, secretary and general manager of the American Press Association, in an address stated that the American Press Association began its work as the representative of weekly newspapers when advertising rates were less than 10 cents per thousand circulation while they have been increased within 14 years to 20 cents per thousand circulation. The business placed by the American Press Association, he said, was about $10,000, the first year. This year its billings to advertisers would run to $2,500,000.

Many questions were asked Mr. Finley, most of them indicating that the questioners regarded 30 per cent commission as too high, and that the increase in rates has been proportionate to the general increase in prices throughout the country, and that the volume of business now received is merely in line with the increase in advertising volume in all publications.

Ole Buck, field secretary, Nebraska Press Association, explained in detail how its affairs are being handled, and stating that although the Nebraska Association handles only state advertising, it is contemplating pooling with several other adjoining states to handle its national advertising.

Following his address, the Texas Association decided to formulate plans to handle its own advertising. A subscription fund of $1,000 which will be increased to $2,500, was immediately subscribed to pay the initial expense of the organization.

J. Claude Wells, of the Wellington (Tex.) Leader, was elected president of the Panhandle Press Association, succeeding L. P. Loomis, who has moved to Torrington, Wyo. J. G. Graves, of Portales, N. M., was elected vice-president; Clyde Warwick of Canyon, Tex., secretary-treasurer. No program was rendered, the members meeting with the Texas Press Association in its annual session. Amarillo was selected as the meeting place in 1925.

Rhea Howard, who has been secretary and treasurer and business manager for the company, was re-elected to those positions.

These officers, with R. E. Huff, J. A. Kemp, G. D. Anderson, Wylie Robertson of Witchita Falls and T. C. Thatcher of Oklahoma City, constitute the board of directors of the company.

Mr. Howard, in becoming president and general manager of the company, returns to an office he relinquished when he became postmaster.

UNFAIR PRACTICES CHARGED

Five Furniture Firms Cited in U. S. Trade Commission Complaints

Four New York furniture concerns and one in Philadelphia have been charged with unfair advertising in complaints issued this week by the Federal Trade Commission. They were: Kritzer, Inc., Grand Rapids Sales Company, M. H. Powers Company, Inc., and Nathan Tannebaum trading as the Capitol Furniture Company, all of New York and the Furniture Manufacturers' Show Rooms, Inc., of Philadelphia.

The complaints allege that the companies cited make a practice of advertising as representatives of manufacturers so as to create the impression that purchasers are buying from them and saving the profits of middlemen.

In the case of the Philadelphia concern it is charged that a slogan "Direct from the Factory" is used in advertisements, and that certain advertisements have appeared describing furniture as "mahogany" when the furniture so advertised is made of other wood.

MOORE BACK FROM FLORIDA

A. N. P. A. Official Prophesies Larger Citrus Ad Appropriation

An enlarged advertising appropriation from the Florida Citrus Exchange may be expected this year, according to Thomas H. Moore, associate director of the Bureau of Advertising, A. N. P. A., who returned to New York this week after a canvassing trip among Exchange directors at Tampa.

T. H. MOORE

The advertising fund of the Exchange is based on tonnage, and Moore reports that the volume of the business this year will be a record breaker and will probably equal 60 per cent of the entire citrus crop of the state.

In advance of the Exchange meeting strenuous competition developed between one or two of the mediums to be used for advertising purposes, and directors voted to postpone settlement of advertising questions until July 18. At that time it is expected that the allotment for newspaper space will be larger than usual, Moore reports.

Moore also reported that the Thomas Advertising Service of Jacksonville and Tampa will continue to place the business, but stated it was probable the directors would elect an advertising manager.

Some items from London, England, that will show how the Advertising and Publishing Men of Great Britain are preparing and building for the Great Advertising Convention in London, in July, 1924.

By HERBERT C. RIDOUT

(London Editor, EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

Convention Plans Practically Complete:—The last moment additions to the Convention program are of a character that show it to be all but complete.

In Sir Charles Higham's paper on "The Future of Advertising" to be delivered at the Convention, I understand he will devote himself to proving the supremacy of the newspaper in advertising.

Our American visitors will find the British arrangements for their reception and comfort complete and all-embracing. Their baggage will be taken care of right up to their rooms in their London hotels. Their Entertainment programmes will await them at their hotels and will furnish full details of social plans. The Convention programs will be distributed with the A. A. C. W. badges in exchange for the Registration Card at Bush House, Strand, at which centre will also be an information booth.

C. K. Woodbridge, of the New York Advertising Club, has arrived in London.

Houston's Little Dinner:—The Advertising Club of Houston has planned to give a dinner in London on Sunday, July 13, to leading publishers and members of the Thirty Club of London.

Herbert Hoover Tells London:—A letter received by Andrew Milne in London from Herbert Hoover, Secretary of the U. S. Department of Commerce, is being widely quoted here. Mr. Hoover says the London Convention "marks a further step in the elevation of the fundamental elements of business and a distinct advance in the world's fight for truth in advertising."

British Empire Exhibition Banquet:—The announcement of a banquet to delegates by the board of the British Empire Exhibition on Monday, July 14, sets the official seal of recognition upon the Convention. Lord Stevenson, who will preside, in addition to being Chairman of the Exhibition Board, is Chairman of Crosse & Blackwell, Ltd. and of John Walker & Son Ltd. ("Johnnie Walker").

Registrations Flow In:—Applications for registration are flowing steadily in and it is quite evident that there will not be the slightest difficulty in filling the Convention Halls at Wembley.

Hulton Ad-Manager Retires:—Fleet street feels a little pang of regret at the retirement of Mr. J. Dodds, for many years the advertisement director of Messrs. E. Hulton & Co., Ltd., in charge of both London and Manchester publications. A lunch was given in his honor on June 10, and an illuminated address presented to him. Mr. Dodds did a great work and is a popular figure in advertising circles.

J. Murray Allison, at one time advertisement manager of the London Times and director of the Field and Queen, has been appointed advertisement director of these and other newspapers now owned by Allied Newspapers, Ltd., (the Berry group).

Advertising Agents Guildhall Banquet:—British sectional interests are vying with each other to pay honor to our visitors. Up to now, the Association of British Advertising Agents seems to score with the announcement just made of a banquet to overseas agents to be held at the City of London Guildhall, the civic headquarters of London's Corporation. It is fixed for Tuesday, July 15. On Saturday, July 19, the Association will convey its guests to Windsor Castle, with lunch in the Great Park, and a river trip to follow.

Delegates and Pilgrim Fathers:—When the delegates visit Hull, Yorkshire, it is hoped that they may be present at the unveiling of a memorial to the Pilgrim Fathers who left Immingham in 1608. The topmost piece of stone in the memorial came from Plymouth Rock, Massachusetts, where the Pilgrims first landed. The Hull ranch of the Anglo-American Society are responsible for the arrangements.

Tourist Campaign Successful

Michigan Tourist and Resort Association reports that the results of their newspaper advertising campaign were three times greater this year than last. A list of Sunday newspapers in the south were used to open the campaign. The amount of space taken was but little greater than that for the early part of 1923. The entire campaign has been placed in newspapers, with the exception of a half-page in a national magazine.

Beitler Succeeds Smith

Brooks H. Beitler, for several years city editor, Chicago Daily News, has been appointed news editor to succeed Henry Justin Smith who has become assistant to the President of the University of Chicago. John Craig goes from assistant city editor to city editor, Lewis W. Hunt from rewrite desk to assistant city editor.

SCHOOLS OFFER AD COURSES

113 Institutions Give Instruction in Advertising, Cherington Finds

Advertising is now taught by professional teachers and practical business men in 113 schools in the United States, according to a complete survey of the advertising training facilities of this country announced this week by Paul Cherington, chairman of the educational committee, A. A. C. W.

PAUL T. CHERINGTON

The survey, made under Cherington's direction, covers practically all the outstanding colleges, universities, correspondence schools, advertising club schools and classes, and Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. schools.

Most of the colleges and universities were found to have professors in charge of advertising classes, while the advertising clubs, Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. schools are taught by advertising experts from business life.

The courses include instruction such as the psychology of ad advertising, marketing, merchandising, accounting, copy writing, typography, the application of art, and the mechanics of advertising.

Cherington was for several years professor in charge of advertising courses in the Harvard University School of Business Administration.

Best News Stories Reprinted

"Thirteen Bell-ringers of 1923" is the newest publication issued by the Business Survey Department of the Chicago Tribune, containing the 13 best news stories of the year. Among them is Robert M. Lee's classic on the Ku Klux Klan in Louisiana and Genevieve Forbe's story on the trial of Mrs. Klimek and Mrs. Koulik, the "arsenic cousins."

Correction

In a recent EDITOR & PUBLISHER news story relating to the new Sioux City (Ia.) Register, it was stated that there were two other dailies in Sioux City, the Tribune, morning except Sunday and the Journal evening and Sunday. It should have stated that both the Tribune and the Journal publish both morning and evening editions, the Tribune being regarded as the evening paper, and the Journal the morning publication.

Farming in Iowa is Big Business

Lying between the two great rivers, the Mississippi and the Missouri, Iowa is 95% farm lands, and leads her sister states with Billion dollar crops.

Iowa is situated in the very heart of the corn belt and is first in total production with a tremendous yield of over 420,000,000 bushels. Iowa has the best corn growing land in the world. Every acre is amazingly rich.

One-tenth of all the food products in the United States come from the

STATE OF IOWA

Every farm is on a road to market and the "big city" that brings the daily paper, the news of the world, and the things to buy.

Of all the states in the Union, Iowa enjoys the highest per capita of wealth and the lowest percentage of illiteracy.

Iowa people have money to spend. They are live, active, progressive people. Their home life is of the highest type and they are exceptional prospects for advertised goods.

Newspaper Librarian, Minnesota Historical Society

NO reader, I venture to say, was more interested in a non-business way than myself in the recent article in EDITOR & PUBLISHER on the twelfth anniversary of the present ownership of that paper. I have been called the dean of St. Paul newspaper men. Possibly I am also the dean, or near dean, of contributors to EDITOR & PUBLISHER and the JOURNALIST.

JOHN TALMAN

Thirty years or more ago the JOURNALIST, then under the editorship of Allan Forman, published the full text of "Hackneyed Expressions," a paper written by me for use in Thomas B. Mosier's school of journalism in Kansas City, one of the first concerns of the kind, I believe, that ever existed. The paper in question ridiculed a large number of stereotyped and superfluous phrases in common use by newspapers from time immemorial. It was pointed out, for example, that men were never building a fence, but were "engaged in" building it. None of the 12 months could be mentioned simply by its name. It must always be "the month of." No suicides ever took poison, but there were numerous instances of their taking "a quantity of" poison.

Ever since that event of a long generation ago I have written frequently for the JOURNALIST and its successor, EDITOR & PUBLISHER, the newspaper man's paper which may have had contemporaries, but never had a rival. The range of my subjects has been rather wide, both prose and verse being employed. In the latter form my chief contributions were jingles describing yellow journalism at the time it first began to flourish and depicting the awful nightmares that tortured the historical society newspaper librarian who in his dreams was back in the newspaper office trying, single-handed and alone, to get the paper to press amid the most staggering and perplexing of unheard-of difficulties and complications.

Of all the prose contributions to EDITOR & PUBLISHER which have flowed from this pen, the one which carried perhaps the most of heart and soul was an appreciation of the value of that periodical as an aid in keeping track of old friends, finding lost ones and chronicling the fortunes of both new and old intimates and acquaintances. As you become full of years you find, or should find, some of your most precious joys in old existing friendships and memories of choice companionships ended long ago by the Grim Reaper.

To my mind, the best story I ever furnished EDITOR & PUBLISHER, which was printed several years ago, was an account of the memorable June night in 1876, when I was telegraph editor of the old Albany Argus and we scooped our morning contemporary unmercifully with the announcement of the defeat and massacre of Gen. Custer and his command by the Sioux Indians under Sitting Bull.

Now for the capsheaf of my connection with EDITOR & PUBLISHER. For the past eight years I have been its regular news correspondent at St. Paul and as such have received such thumping monthly checks that I have been terribly embarrassed to decide what to do with so much money.

WHAT OUR READERS SAY

Trade-Marked Reporters

San Diego, Cal.

To Editor & Publisher: The status of the real newspaper man seems to have been lost with the passage of time in attempts to cover him up with the camouflage of calling his successors journalists.

If it be "journalists" it is time to remind that once in awhile even the journalistic worm may turn, if only in self-defense; the present turning being occasioned by the season's output of fiction, which again includes a bumper crop of newspaper yarns.

The trouble with these effusions is that they are all alike. Either they are written around the precocious and exuberant cub, or they reflect the glamour and sparkle that hangs like a halo over the star reporter's bulging brow. But always there is a city editor—the same one. Universally he is lean, cadaverous, fierce. He swallows cigars whole and stabs folks with his scissors. He alternately gnaws his mustache or the necks of those who come to consult him. He eats litle copy boys and has a profane vocabulary consisting of 3,000 new and original blasphemies. He is a journalistic firecracker, pinwheel and skyrocket combined, and is likely to explode at any time with a loud report. Apparently he sleeps in the office; if he ever left it he would be lynched by a horde of enemies. All this in fiction.

As a matter of fact, the city editor is a rather likable person. He has a load of worries and bears them bravely. He "sasses" nobody, for he is too busy to fight and he knows he would be whipped anyway. He smokes an ancient pipe and borrows his tobacco and matches from the reporters—which proves he has real friends working with him in peace and without baiting or battle.

There is no star reporter—outside of fiction. Any man or woman who posed as one would be promptly sent to cover the morgue until he or she cooled off. As for the cub, he exists only in the fictionist's elastic fancy. There may be some of tender years connected with the paper to pursue pictures or answer the phone, but this youth has no more chance to dig up a world-quaking scoop than he has to get the managing editor's job tomorrow.

It is all rather wearisome and brings the thought that the writers of newspaper romances ought to put a day or night working in a metropolitan office. There would be one good result certainly. They would emerge too tired to perpetuate any more of the stuff for a time at least.

Then there is the idea of placing journalism under a state regulation by the imposition of examinations on journalists as they do upon lawyers and doctors before they may practice their professions.

Brilliant idea. What? If it does not accomplish any more for journalism than it seems sometimes to have accomplished for law and medicine, the world will not be turned upside down by the reformation in journalistic circles.

The average reporter is above the average in intelligence. He has to be, or he couldn't be a reporter, and stay one, very long. The reporter who hasn't common sense is not a reporter at all.

It takes more energy, more determination, more honesty of purpose and more knowledge of human nature to find out just why little Katie Smith ran away dinary suit at law.

There's Katie's mother's story and the story of Katie's sister and the story Katie's father knows and won't tell and the story the Smith family neighbors do not know and insist upon telling, and the story of the policeman on the beat who got his job through the Smith influence, and the story of the man from the front office whose brother-in-law has a grudge against Smith the elder—and everyone of the stories absolutely different in every important detail.

And not one of the people who please themselves by repeating this ancient phrase, "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you," would have taken one half the pains to get at the actual truth than the reporter these people want to "regulate" took as a matter of course.

Who's going to do the regulating and how? Some graduate of the so-called schools of journalism or the professors of those schools?

The real reporter is not a graduate of a school for journalism. He has a "nose for news," and is not guided by set rules of practice and procedure of a lawyer. He must make his own rules as the occasion warrants. He is not controlled by the results of a clinic, of analogy or a post mortem, as is the physician. He must furnish his own remedy without a precedent to work upon.

Real reporters, like geniuses, are born not made.

Frank W. Mulock.

Invaluable to Journalism Teachers

May 22, 1924.

To Editor & Publisher: I would not be without Editor & Publisher. It keeps me in touch with things.

As a teacher of journalism, I need your publication. It has often been said that a teacher of journalism should have a wide experience to draw on to illustrate the points presented in theory. In addition, I believe, he needs Editor & Publisher to keep him in contact with the developements in the newspaper business. I have found many valuable lessons illustrating the application of theory and the attitude of newspaper men concerning certain practices, which I have thought of sufficient importance to pass on to my class either in whole or in part. This material has taken up several class periods and has given the class a better idea of "what it is all about" than anything else could, except practical experience.

To Editor & Publisher: Pray accept my heartiest congratulations on your superb "On-to-Britain" number of the Editor & Publisher.

Mechanically, it is a thing of beauty, and a cursory glance through its pages here at the office shows me that I am going to spent considerable time at home. perusing the splendid articles it contains. Such a publication I am sure will make a decided impression at the convention, and I do hope the returns will be commensurate with the large amount of labor that has been spent upon its production.

Sorry to take issue but the *Oakland (Cal.) This is supplemented at Christmas and Easter by special sections, the cover page in color, ranging from 6 to 8 pages exclusively of church advertising. The Oakland Tribune bases its claim to first place in church advertising in the country on these figures. Readers Demand Constructive News

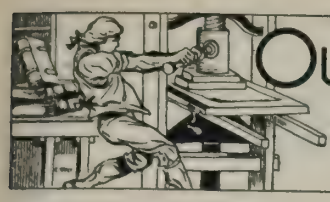
Investigation by officers of the United Press, as reported at a recent meeting of the American Society of Newspaper Editors, indicates that there is a decided demand for a high grade of constructive news. The cash value of crime news is dropping.

This means that the readers of your paper, Mr. Publisher, are becoming increasingly interested in those events in your community and in the nation which tend to make for a higher type of citizenship. The people who go to church in your town want news of a solid constructive type. It is well worth your while to stimulate this class of reader interest.

Copy furnished by this Department to be used in display space suggests reasons each week why a man should go to church and support the best things of the community. Put your paper on the side of the constructive element by using copy of this sort.



Proofs of ads available to all papers can be obtained from E. H. Harris, Richmond, Ind. Proofs of ads which relate to the religious interest in current themes, such as the high school commencement, Fourth of July, etc., can be obtained by one paper in a town for an extremely moderate price. Our Own World of Letters

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

JOURNALISM is undergoing a radical change in Russia—a fact emphasized by the Nation in its issue for June 25, in an article entitled "The Press in the Soviet Republics." This article is based upon information taken from the Moscow monthly Journalist—the organ of the Section of Press Workers of Union of Educational Workers.

Throughout the Soviet Union the fifth of May is observed as the Annual Press Day. The May issue of the Journalist printed a detailed review of the developments and achievements during the year. The following resume is made by the Nation:

> During this period the daily circulation of all newspapers in the Soviet Union increased from 1,950,000 copies on April 1, 1923, to 2,520,000 copies on March 1, 1924. The number of newspapers during the same period decreased from 560 to 498. Thus by March 1 the circulation of the Soviet press nearly touched the pre-war level of the whole Russian press. The total circulation of the latter in 1914 amounted to a little over 2,700,000 copies daily. By the end of May, according to later reports in the Soviet press, this figure had already been passed, and the Soviet press is well on its way to reach the goal set for the current year: a daily circulation of 5,000,000 copies by the end of 1924.

A paper taken for special illustration is the Pravda of Moscow, which on January 1, 1924 had a circulation a little more than 100,000, and which had by the end of May almost 300,000. For the first time the Soviet Press has made money, even though the subscription price has, in most cases, been reduced. The Izvestia of Moscow netted a profit during the year of over 800,000 gold rubles ($400,000). During the last quarter of 1923 and the first quarter of 1924 something like $75,000 was spent in subsidies for newspapers unable to meet expenses. A special effort is being made to increase the number of peasant readers by increasing the distribution of newspapers in the rural villages. The immediate goal, according to the Nation, is to reach a circulation of 2,000,000 copies for the peasant press.

ON every desk in the city room a copy of "The Best News Stories of 1923" might well be placed. In the preparation of this annual of American newspaper writing invitations were sent to some 400 newspapers to rush from 3 to 15 of their best stories for consideration. In addition, a request for material was put on the news wires. From the thousands of stories critically examined, the best examples of straight reporting, feature writing, foreign correspondence, interviews, accounts of sports, and human interest stories were selected for publication in the volume. One cannot glance through the volume without being impressed by the fact that some of the finest things in contemporary literature are to be found in the daily press.

The book opens with "The Wreck of the Twentieth Century Limited" by Robert M. Lee, city editor of the Chicago Tribune, and closes with "From Stick-up Man to Squire" by George P. Stone, reporter on the Chicago Daily News. I would not want to give the impression that Chicago newspapers are overplayed in the volume, for they are not. One striking thing about the book is the geographical distribution of these news stories—a fact that shows that good reporting is not confined to any one city, much less to any one newspaper. In fact, a few of the best stories are those put on the wire by news-gathering organizations. Personally, I am convinced of the truth of the assertion that neither the reputation of the writer nor the importance of the newspaper was taken into consideration in the selection of material.

The sins of commission in the volume will be hard to find. In spite of sympathy with the work as a whole, I am a little surprised at some of the sins of omission. But not all of us think alike. If we did there would be no interest in a horse race. Then too, this volume is the first of what will probably be an annual affair.

However much opinions may differ about stories omitted one criticism is justified: the introduction by the editor, Joseph Anthony, is too brief. I am inclined to differ from his opinion that the principles of good news writing are not essentially different from those that apply to a well-written novel or short story. The aim of the novel is to interpret life as it is, and that of the short story to portray an incident. It is a chapter out of a life story. Now the thing that gives great value to a news story is the element of the unusual—life out of the ordinary. At the New York Newspaper Club the other day Irvin S. Cobb related to me the most thrilling and extraordinary tale I had ever heard. But he remarked, "I can't sell it to the magazines because the story is true." Yet if the story were printed I agree with Cobb that readers would remark, "This thing simply couldn't have happened." Yet it did happen, and Cobb would prove it if put on the witness stand. But that is another story—as Kipling would say.

The issues raised are minor. For the working press the volume is, to use the slang of the street, "a whale of a book." For the average reporter it shows how to get away from the stereotyped mode of treatment in the handling of news, and offers numerous suggestions for a mode of treatment in news writing that is different. It is published by Small, Maynard and Company of Boston.

A BETTER book than "Speaking of Operations—And Other Humor" by Irvin S. Cobb (George H. Doran Company) would be hard to find to slip into the pocket for use on the vacation trip.

In this volume, which is beautifully bound and shows that bookmaking is not a lost art in America, the reader will find some of Cobb's best copy in 6 takes, of which the first is the one mentioned in the title. For many the second take, "Eating in Two or Three Languages," is possibly the fattest from the view point of humor. Those who want a little pathos and romance should turn to "A Plea for Old Cap Collier"—the gentleman who made the nickel famous in our boyhood days. Other good takes are "One Third Off" and "The Young Nuts of America."

A good reporter like Cobb can always turn out good copy. In this case as I have remarked, the copy comes to the reader in a container that is a delight to the eye.

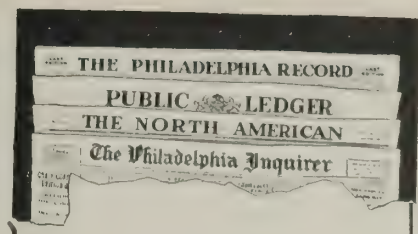
SPACE on the reference shelf of the newspaper library should be found for "Musical America's Guide," compiled by John C. Freund, editor of Musical America and The Musical Trades, and published by the Musical America Company, 501 Fifth avenue, New York City. A descriptive headline for an extended review of this book would be "a digest of the musical resources, not only of the United States, but also of Canada."

The editorial writer should read the chapter, "How to Develop Your City Musically." Certainly the provincial press is not doing what it should to interpret music to its community. The "bone-yard" editor should note the chapter on "Music Conventions in 1924" and "Festivals and Music Weeks." The advertising manager should have his attention directed to the chapter, "Business Methods in the Music Studio" which says that there is no teacher, however high or however humble, who cannot be helped to larger prosperity by adequate advertising of the right kind, and which suggests that a fixed percentage of every musician's income should be devoted to advertising.



Incidentally, the book is a practical gazeteer, which gives the important cities of the United States along with a lot of useful information about them. In listing the newspapers in the cities the names of the music editors are given.

Preliminary plans for the annual conventions of the Audit Bureau of Circulations and the American Association of Advertising Agencies to be held in Chicago, Oct. 16 and 17 are already being broadcast.

Featuring the meetings will be a dinner to be given jointly by the A.A.A.A. and the A.B.C. The A.A.A.A. is also planning a "get-together luncheon" with advertisers and publishers as guests.

The A.B.C. announces that in addition to the program of the advertising agents, programs are being arranged for the advertiser, newspaper, magazine, farm paper, and business publication sections.

These branches of the A.B.C. will hold sectional meetings at Hotel La Salle, Oct. 16, and the result of their deliberations will be reported at the annual meeting next day.

The meeting of the executive board of the A.A.A.A. which always precedes the annual meeting will be held Oct. 15. The headquarters hotel, in which the executive board sessions and the annual meeting will be held, is the Drake Hotel.

The two conventions are being heralded as "the largest assemblage of advertising interests ever held in this country."

The wealth of the state is well divided, as is indicated in automobile ownership, there being more than 583,000 licensed machines.

In rank of total distribution, Indiana is eighth, although in population the state is eleventh. There are five persons per motor vehicle or 192 cars to every 1000 persons.

The number of trucks and commercial cars rank Indiana in the same relative position, eighth, but she is in a position to surpass two or three states quickly. The reason, no doubt, lies in the fact that the farmers of Indiana are large owners of commercial cars.

Probably nothing so well indicates the class of citizenship and the demand for better in life than good roads. Indiana takes first rank in improved highways and has nearly double the mileage of New York.

With the fact in mind that Indiana people and cities are prosperous, an intensive cultivation will win distribution and popularize your merchandise.

PARASOLS!

Get your readers under shade these hot summer days: and chase advertisements for

Shade hats
Awnings
Tents

New York Jewelers are already advertising "Fall Costume Jewelry." How about your local stores?

Remind them special attention is being given to necklaces, where pearls dominate. Sapphires are also being used. Also there's a good deal of talk about brooches—brooches that match necklaces and bracelets.

New York Jewelers at the moment are also advertising choker necklaces of large silver beads, thought especially effective with summer frocks.

How about talking to your local laundries about co-operating in a big display advertising campaign? Boom some slogan like this; "Send Laundry Outside—Keep Cool Inside." Home is no place for steaming tubs. Also:

Electric washing machines
Electric irons.

DO you ever get any advertising out of the billiard parlors?

Make a page layout for some attractive small ads, good heading across the top, like "Billiards, the Gentlemen's Game," or "Billiards, a Gentlemen's Recreation," and give a little historical write-up, also the view of some of your prominent business men on billiards, then get your leading parlors to use some clean arguments. Boost their ventilation and coolness. Help them stimulate the business for their dull summer months and you'll make advertisers of them and elevate their business, as well as boosting it in the eyes of the public. Be sure and get a prominent doctor who plays billiards to give you an interview on the "health-help" end of the game.—Ehu Ghbert, Chicago.

Coal dealers of Manchester, N. H., have decided to stimulate business during the dull months of summer by offering a special reduced price of $1 per ton for cash purchases of coal during April; 75 cents a ton during May; 50 cents during June and 25 cents during July. The result has been a series of ads which are repeated at intervals and mean considerable revenue to local papers. A little persuasion by a clever advertising man might win your dealers to the same plan. —Fred E. Beane, Manchester (N. H.) Union-Leader.

Once a week one of the leading Washington dailies runs a large co-operative ad of the fish, oyster and sea food companies. This ad shows the value of fish as a nutritious food. Each week some important but little known fact concerning "fats in fish" or other specific qualities furnishes the "lead" under which is run the names of a string of fish merchants.—C. M. Littlejohn, Washington, D. C.

The importance of local women in business enterprises of various sorts filled a full page of advertising for a middle west paper recently. The page was headed "(Name of City) Women Conducting Successful Business Firms." Fifteen places of business, from the movie theatre to the chiropractor were included. Looks good because there are a great many women who conduct individual establishments. Present a page of this kind and say: "Just the Women Advertisers Get On This Page."—George C. Marcley, Ogdensburg (N. Y.) Republican-Journal.

We are publishing a four-page advertising sheet, the same size as our paper. Since our circulation is largely country, we find this a good way to give our advertisers "town coverage" as we distribute the bill (which we call the Junior Democrat) to every home in Washington, Ia. We use the same ads as appear in our weekly paper and charge 5 cents an inch for space in the Junior Democrat. The revenue from the sheet just pays for the expense, but it means additional advertising for our columns and it is effective advertising for the merchants.—Donald O. Ross, Washington (Ia.) Democrat.

Co-operative advertising on the part of certain groups has been found beneficial by the members of the group itself and, incidentally to the advertising medium selected for the publicity. The first requisite to such advertising is a spirit of co-operation on the part of the group members, and such a spirit is not always present among competitors. The advertising solicitor may be able to assist in bringing it about, while in other cases it may come from the group tself, or perhaps from an outsider. In Lawrence, Kan., this kind of advertising is being used effectively by the clothing dealers, the insurance men and the realtors. In addition to the general advertising of the group, which is either unsigned or signed by the names of all the members, the individual members frequently tie up with it by taking space in the same issue of the paper. — Paul C. Rankin, Lawrence (Kan.) Journal-World.

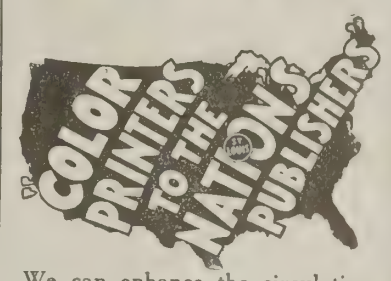
With "build with brick" as its head, one of the Washington, D. C., papers has grouped in a large weekly display ad, a host of contractors and companies interested in this type of dwelling and business construction.—C. M. Littlejohn, Washington, D. C.

Horse-back riding is coming back with a boom. People of all ages are taking it up again. The Boston Herald has been obtaining extra advertising from dealers in harness, riding equipment, riding stables, etc., and has published this advertising along with feature stories on the subject.—James M. Mosely, Boston, Mass.

What furnishing goods stores are open after 6 o'clock in your city? It would be interesting to the men of the city to learn about these stores. Would they take a page under an appropriate heading?—Frank H. Williams, Fort Wayne, Ind.

In cities where there are car lines there are generally one or more principal transfer points where people wait for cars. And, of course, at such transfer points the business of the stores is particularly good. Such business could, undoubtedly, be made even better by advertising. If all the stores at some especially congested transfer point would go together in an advertisement bidding for the business of the people boarding the cars at the point, it would help them greatly in getting more business.—Frank H. Williams, Fort Wayne, Ind.

"Week-end Specials." Under this large caption of ribbon may be included special copy each Friday or Saturday that may be obtained from merchants dealing in camping outfits for the week-end tourists, confectionery, tobacco and cigarettes, etc. —C. M. Littlejohn, Washington, D. C.



The shoe merchants of South Bend, Ind., last year joined together in a "Walk and Be Healthy" week. Each dealer played up this in his window and all retail shoe advertising was kept together on a two-page spread in the local papers. Last June the merchants officially opened the white shoe season by displaying whites and nothing else in their windows. Other merchants in other cities can capitalize this.—James M. Mosely, Boston, Mass.

Now when it is only about half a year until Christmas it would be a good stunt for the financial institutions who are conducting Christmas savings clubs to run ads urging people to take out half year clubs which will give them money for Christmas use. The paper should be able to get such ads without any great trouble. —Frank H. Williams, Santa Ana, Cal.

PUBLIC LOSING FAITH IN PULITZER AWARDS

Columbia University's present method of picking the Pulitzer prize winners each year is making of the awards a public laughing stock, it is claimed in a recent unsigned article on "The Pulitzer Prizes" appearing in McNaught's Magazine, published by V. V. McNitt of the McNaught Syndicate, New York.

"Some excitement has been aroused in those quarters which get excited about such matters because a committee appointed to recommend an American play for the Pulitzer prize selected The Show-Off, and their recommendation was not accepted by the final powers at Columbia University, who awarded the prize to Hell Bent fer Heaven, which was written by a Columbia English instructor. The committee thus "turned down" was composed of Prof. Phelps, Owen Johnson and Clayton Hamilton. Mr. Hamilton, to be sure, was a minority favoring Hell Bent fer Heaven.

"The final power of award, for all the Pulitzer prizes, resides in Columbia University, and its school of Journalism founded by Mr. Pulitzer. The jury, or trustees, are not at all bound to follow the recommendations of those committees they select to aid them. Their committees are often selected from practical workers in the arts. But they themselves are teachers, with the academic point of view. Moreover, the committees usually ignore the terms of Mr. Pulitzer's gift and try to select the best play or novel or what not of the year.

"The trustees at Columbia are uncomfortably aware that the prize was not willed for the best play, or the best novel, or the best history, at all. It was willed for the one that did the most to improve American morals, or manners, or patriotism. Mr. Pulitzer's idea of art and history was quaint. But as plays or novels which set out to improve us are usually quite awful, the trustees, reluctantly, generally let the prizes go to a moderately good play or book, lest the whole affair become absurd.

"Now, The Show-Off cannot possibly be said directly to improve our manners or morals. Neither, for that matter, can Hell Bent fer Heaven. But the latter play is written in an idiom farther removed from the realistic patter of our middle class speech, and is probably less disturbing to the academic mind, though considerably less vital to the bulk of American theatre goers. Personally, I like The Show-Off better, but I like Hell Bent fer Heaven, too; and I am bound to admit that no prizes are needed to encourage authors to write like the former, while immediate popularity seldom comes to encourage authors of works like the latter. I advise Messrs. Phelps and Johnson to keep their shirts on.

"What we need, in regard to the Pulitzer prizes, is not a Show-Off, but a show-down. Either the terms of the Pulitzer gift should be followed strictly, in which case the awards would have little or nothing to do with artistic merit, or else these terms should be quite ignored, competent juries of award appointed, and their selections adhered to, with the object of winning public confidence and establishing a high and genuine artistic standard—which, incidentally, would do as much for morals and manners as anything else.

"At present the public—and rightly—distrusts awards coming out of Columbia. It has seen too many good professors come out of there, ejected from behind.

"I was once on a committee to recommend a cartoon for the Pulitzer prize, and we selected one by Rollin Kirby showing France before a mirror, laying aside her liberty cap and trying on a steel helmet. It was so simple and so eloquent that it topped all other candidates. What was our surprise—or mine, at any rate—to see the prize given to another cartoon by Mr. Kirby, a commonplace one taking a crack at the Bolshevists in Russia. It wouldn't do to offend France. And possibly some Columbia professor was looking for an exchange job at the Sorbonne. But what either consideration has to do with the best American cartoon, God and Nicholas Murray Butler alone know.

"If the trustees of the Pulitzer fund really want to win the confidence of the public, they will seek the advice of outside experts, and then they will follow this advice to the letter. Their present course is making of the awards a public laughing stock."

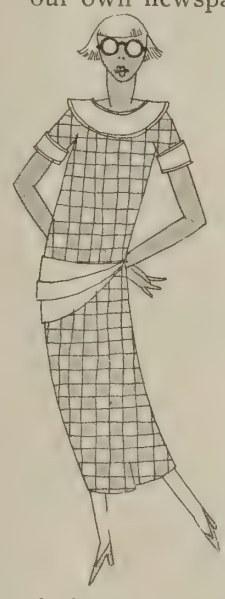
Blue Ribbon FASHIONS

EVERY normal American woman is interested in clothes. It is the one subject exclusively feminine.



Dotted Swiss, brocaded satin, voile, crepe de chine, and all the varied and complicated combinations of materials are only names to men who usually pass out of the conversation when it gets beyond the red flannel stage. But to women it is the universal language.

Most newspapers have recognized this great, specialized interest of women. But many, we think, have not given it enough concentrated attention. They have not given their women friends the best material available.

A good selection of fashion features means more favor with women — more readers among women; and that means increased power to sell the innumerable advertised articles which women buy. Poor fashion articles do not fool women—more than once. To make your fashion features bring you the greatest possible return, they must be authoritative, well written, well illustrated, and as fresh and up-to-date as modern communications and newspaper speed can make them.

Such qualifications exist in the fashion articles of The Chicago Tribune, a pioneer in the field of features for women, the first great newspaper to have a woman as Sunday editor, and to have women exclusively handling women's features. The fashion articles we offer you are only those used by The Chicago Tribune and The News of New York. Only such features are offered for sale by The Chicago Tribune Newspaper Syndicate as are considered beneficial in building up our own newspapers.

The Last Word in Paris Fashions

(Weekly)

The five excellent fashion articles of The Tribune may be bought separately or in combination. In a weekly letter from Paris our special correspondents describe and sketch the latest and best costumes created by the famous French designers and worn by the best dressed women of Paris. These articles, beautifully illustrated, not only show definite creations but give authoritative information on the trend of Paris styles.

What American Women Are Wearing

By Corinne Lowe
(Daily and Weekly)

America's best known writer on fashions is Corinne Lowe, whose articles on what is in vogue appear daily and Sunday in The Tribune. Miss Lowe writes from New York, where she is able to keep in touch with the latest fashion developments. The weekly article, with its fine, large illustration, makes an ideal front page for a woman's section. The daily article, also illustrated, will add women readers to your regular daily editions.

The Well Dressed Man

By A. T. Gallico
(Daily and Weekly)

To many newspapers, a men's fashion article will be an entirely new feature. The Tribune has tried out this feature and has found a genuine response. The articles are written in New York by A. T. Gallico, and give news and information about correct dress for men. They are watched closely by stores for men's furnishings. The daily articles run about 100 agate lines, with a small illustration. The weekly articles are longer—about a column of copy with a three or four column illustration. Buy The Tribune fashion features and advertise them well in your territory. We do not believe better fashion material is available. Write or wire for rates and proofs.

Chester Gump in Australia

Uncle Bim, who owns most of Australia, has sent for his little favorite, and Sidney Smith is doing the rest. The children will be wild about Chester's adventures. If your territory is open, don't miss this chance to start the Gumps Sunday page—the great colored comic page for children.

Philadelphia's City Hall would be buried under the breakfast food of the Bulletin Reader

"In Philadelphia nearly everybody reads The Bulletin"

Who is the biggest buyer of breakfast foods in Philadelphia?

For the Bulletin goes into practically all of the 400,000 separate homes of the city and 100,000 more outside the city limits.

With over half a million copies daily the Bulletin naturally dominates Philadelphia—there can be no substitute for circulation. The circulation of The Philadelphia Bulletin is one of the largest in America.

Strong Local Editorials First, Then Live "Home Town" News, Kansas Editor Says—Cares Little for Shrieking Sensations and Prolix Foreign Affairs—Bull Pen for Cripple Wits

By WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE

Written for and copyrighted 1924, by EDITOR & PUBLISHER

THE important editorial field of the small city newspaper is the local editorial. It is the weak spot of the country newspaper in the United States, and the one spot in which it has no competition.

The average local reader of a small town of under 100,000 population wants, above everything else, guidance on local matters, such as, say, milk inspection, city bonds, public utility problems, parks, schools, local amusements, and all the other thousand and one things concerning their daily life.

They are not touched, appreciably at least, or not consciously by the plots of Turkey nor, in knowing whether Mussolini has complicated his politics with an assassination, nor in the crimes against Ireland. And those who are interested in such things can find them more intelligently expressed in the larger city dailies or the weekly organs of opinion like the New Republic, the Nation, the World Today, and journals of that type, not to mention the Literary Digest, which supplies completely all the needs required for the moulding of public opinion on world doings.

A few editorials a month on national subjects will save the small city editor's face as a national editorial writer, and the rest of the editorial space may well be given to things nearer home. And the nearer the editorials are to the home-town people, the more they will be read and the more deeply the editor himself will be respected.

In addition to the regular editorial page, it seems to me that a first-page editorial put in the middle of the second or third column, double-leaded, with an 18-point head, always devoted to some local question, which is pending or as nearly at the crisis as local questions ever get, is the most profitable form of editorial.

It should be as hot as the news. It should comment on stories which break after 10 o'clock in the morning, if it is an evening newspaper, or after 6 o'clock in the evening, if it is for a morning newspaper.

It should not be in every day, or it will get stale. Twice a week ought to be the limit. But it is really a first-class medium for editorial expression; always provided that it concerns the people of the town or community in their local politics, business, or community action.

This front page editorial should never be more than 300 words long. It should not wobble. It should be a left-hand punch to the jaw, definite and certain.

No editorial at all is better than a wobbly editorial that takes both sides, holds a judicial viewpoint, or strikes a mushy blow. If you are going to hit, jab with short punches; otherwise cut it out.

The local editorial in the small city newspaper affords the editor his only entrance to the home without a partisan ticket on him. He can talk to Democrats as well as Republicans and get the respect of both; and, if the local editorial is free and unbiased by the public utilities, by the clearing house, or by the country club, he will command a respect in local utterances, which ultimately will give his views on broader matters entrance into his readers' hearts.

EMPORIA GAZETTE EDITOR AT HIS DESK

Now about circulation. I have been running a country newspaper nearly 30 years in one town. I have been stung by piano contests, automobile prizes and premiums, and fancy high-paid canvassers with systems and all sorts of fakirs and humbugs who blow into the small city editorial office.

I have found there is just one way to get circulation and that is to deserve it and to pay for it in the good old-fashioned way.

The way to pay for it is not to go and hire a fast-thinking organization to inflame the readers of your loathed but esteemed contemporary. That gets nowhere permanently.

The way to pay for your subscribers is to buy the best local news. Hire good reporters. Print the best newspaper in your town. Keep publishing the best newspaper in your town. Take the loss of printing that best paper in town for a month, 6 months, a year. Virtue is its own reward. Sooner or later readers will come to you, if you keep printing a better newspaper than the other fellow.

Don't be afraid of piano contests, auto gifts, nor any of those funny stunts used by your opposition. Those things cost more than they are worth and always leave a bad impression on the public. The people know the other fellow is scared as soon as he begins to put on parades and go outside of the news room to get circulation. It is better to spend your dollar on the payroll, than to throw it on the street to pay for shoe leather for high-priced canvassers.

This sage advice is, of course, directed towards editors of small city newspapers. In these small cities of under 100,000 you can presume as a business proposition that you are addressing people who have had at least an average of 2 years in high school for education. You can take it for granted that a majority of them are born Americans of at least one generation of American parentage; that a majority of them are living on something above $75 a month; that they take at least one outside magazine, either a movie magazine, a religious magazine, or a trade journal of some sort; that probably a good fourth belongs to some lodge or lunch club or union, where they meet and discuss local problems with their fellows from what might be called an American angle.

Ninety per cent of the people in a small town of under 100,000, if they take a newspaper at all, choose it fairly intelligently. The other 10 per cent are fooled by the fakir's, "hyped" by big heads, duped by the comic strip, gulled by the sob squad stuff brought from feature peddlers.

Spend your money on this sob squad stuff if you want the 10 per cent and charge it off your income tax. But remember that 90 per cent of your folks want the good old 8-point news set solid, and aren't fooled when you break it into paragraphs and clutter it over with sensational heads.

To stop this nonsense will cost you some readers at first. But after all fools follow the wise, and if you attract wise readers, sooner or later the fools by mere process of imitation will come in, too.

If this dose is too drastic, keep a segregated district in your newspaper a sort of red light bull pen, where you can put the comics, the confessions of a wife, and the other foolish features that are intended to fool the lame brains and the cripple wits in your community.

But don't forget this: the people who have money for the advertisers, the people who make your circulation worth while, are the folks who pretty generally scorn your sensational stuff.

Remember Elbert Hubbard

As the S. S. Republic of the American Line rounds the southern tip of Ireland and passes the Old Head of Kinsale enroute to Southampton and the London Convention, a quiet but impressive ceremony will take place. Sometime during the day or night of July 11th the Republic will pass near to the spot where the ill-fated Lusitania was torpedoed with a loss of more than a thousand lives. Among the lost was Elbert Hubbard. The unpretentious but touching ceremony is intended as an expression of respect from President, H. H. Charles, who was one of Elbert Hubbard's close friends. "Elbert Hubbard and I were close friends for a good many years," said President Charles. "The day before he sailed on the Lusitania he was in my office and made a remark something like this—'If those damn Germans get me, I want you and Bert to be good friends.' You know the rest."

Deep Regret That Chattanooga Executive Cannot Continue Work—Democratic Convention Slows Up 22nd Annual Newspaper Gathering

By ARTHUR T. ROBB, Jr.

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

GROVE Park Inn, Asheville, N. C., July 3.—The twenty-second annual convention of the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association got under way today, receiving the annual report of its President, Arthur G. Newmyer, of New Orleans Item.

ARTHUR G. NEWMYER

To the intense regret of every one present announcement was made of the determination of Walter C. Johnson of Chattanooga News, to resign as secretary and treasurer of the association, owing to the pressure of his private affairs.

A glowing tribute was paid to him by Mr. Newmyer in his report.

The convention, scheduled to run through the balance of the week, got under way slowly due to the absence of members attending the deadlocked convention of the Democratic party at New York. Purveyors to journalism turned out in force in the early part of the week, but only a corporal's guard of publishers arrived up to the opening day.

There was also considerable talk concerning S. N. P. A. presidential succession.

Arthur Newmyer was favored for re-election, his presidential activity gaining general approval. Secretary Johnson, whose candidacy has been advanced by many friends, definitely declined the honor.

Golf tournaments scheduled for both men and women by Walter Savory, Mergenthaler Linotype Company, and Charles D. Webb, Asheville Citizen, gave abundant opportunity for winning one of the following:

Traveling clock, offered by Mergenthaler Linotype; silver cigar box and ash receiver, Blatchford Company; golf bag, Imperial Type Metal Company; traveling bag, International Paper Company; sweater, Miller Saw Trimmer Company; percolator, Cline Electric Manufacturing Company; golf case, Cutler Hammer Manufacturing Company; golf bag, EDITOR & PUBLISHER, and a prize offered by President Newmyer for the best net score. The tournament was scheduled for Thursday at the Asheville Country Club.

Among the early arrivals were Mr. and Mrs. Clark Howell, Sr., and Mr. and Mrs. Clark Howell, Jr., Atlanta Constitution; Mr. and Mrs. F. G. Bell, Savannah News; Major and Mrs. E. B. Stahlman, and Edgar M. Foster, Nashville Banner; Charles D. Webb, Asheville Citizen; P. H. Burdette, Asheville Times; Mr. and Mrs. George B. David, New York; Mr. and Mrs. J. G. Ham, New York; Mr. and Mrs. Fred W. Bott, New Orleans; Walter Savory, New York; Fred Hill, Memphis Tenn.; F. W. Schnell and Frank Barnecott, New York.

A new feature of the program was a series of group meetings, made up of the representatives of papers of varying circulation. A chairman and vice-chairman were appointed to handle each group.

The convention sessions are being confined to the morning hours starting promptly at 9.30 a. m., and closing at 1.30 p. m. This is the first time the association has confined its meetings to morning sessions and it was hoped that it would meet the approval of the golfers.

Following is President Newmyer's report:

Members of the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association:

We meet again after a year's singularly blessed by the absence of any great need for Association action against destructive forces, yet following a period presenting sizeable opportunity for constructive allied activity.

Your Association has, time and again during the current year, demonstrated very definitely its cash-box value to every paper in the membership, but it is because there have been occasions when our members did not seem to appreciate the full scope and significance of our performance that I deem it well to detail tersely the Association's general activities in this annual report:

To Chairman Edgar M. Foster and his committee on Business Office Affairs, the newspapers of the South owe profound thanks for the patience and perseverance that has resulted in the re-establishment of the group advertising movement; the largest, and, I sincerely believe, the most intelligent and intensive combination campaign in the history of American newspapers. From others you will hear details, but I want to go on official record with the statement that each and every newspaper contributing to this campaign has received in white space, in advertising and in merchandising service, more for his money than was ever delivered to any advertiser before. Emphatically believing this to be a fact, I unhesitatingly recommend that campaigns of a kindred character be constantly scheduled, and urge the entire membership, irrespective of operating locations, to team-up with the movement for the common good. Every newspaper gets full 100 per cent individual value for its investment, and at the same time aids materially in a fundamental movement, meaning much to the upbuilding of Southern newspapers. This committee and your secretary have likewise given long hours to research and study that they might intelligently answer inquiries relating to the income tax, to libel and lottery laws, and to employment; all this along with a concerted and consistent effort to build bigger and better public utility advertising for your columns. Theirs has indeed been a year of outstanding service.

The present administration inherited the very serious problem of adjusting the Macon Printers' School situation in a manner fair to all; to the Messrs. Anderson, to the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, to the machinery companies and especially to our membership. I can not adequately express the depth of my appreciation for the conspicuous services in this intricate and troublesome matter rendered by Chairman Giovannoli, Major Potts and the other members of the Printers' School committee. You will hear the result of their months of most minute, careful and considerate study of all phases of this subject, and I urge your unanimous acceptance of their findings.

The Association's traffic and postal interests are chiefly founded upon legislation. These matters have, therefore, naturally been referred to Colonel Robert Ewing and his committee. However, because of the technical and continuing character of our traffic investigations, Colonel Ewing wisely depended upon Secretary Johnson to practically alone handle this important subject. Let me emphasize this point, and it is a matter of written record at headquarters, that Secretary Johnson, in traffic matters alone, has saved certain of our members many, many times the amount of their annual Association dues—saved that during this year and, of course, these economies will multiply during the years to come. Considered from another viewpoint, Secretary Johnson's traffic activities will be reflected in the operations of the entire membership, for now the railroads realize we are in intimate touch with traffic manipulations; ready and willing to fight for our rights.

I had hoped we were coming through the year without legislative trouble. Suddenly we were informed that, at the request of the Interstate Commerce Commission, Section 28 of the Marine Act was about to be enforced. Chairman Ewing went immediately into action. Through our congressional delegations, through fellow-member Commissioner Frederick I. Thompson, and with the cooperation of established traffic bureaus, I believe it not immodest to state that we effectually aided in securing the postponement of this enforcement for a year.

About this same time we were advised by the National Publishers' Association and American Publishers' Conference that an attempt was being made to increase newspaper second-class rates about 75 per cent in the first and second zones. Colonel Ewing, Colonel Woodson, the entire legislative committee and your officers went again immediately into action. We had made conspicuous progress toward the development of opposition to this movement when the American Newspaper Publishers' Association requested that we join them in a concerted prograc—calling for the insertion of "the McKinley amendment" into the Revenue Act. This amendment provided that the war-time increases in second-class rates should be reduced 50 per cent. After several days in Washington we succeeded in aligning practically the solid Southern senatorial delegation behind this program, and I want to record in this connection the very conspicuous and forceful service rendered us by Senators Pat Harrison of Mississippi and Joseph E. Ransdell of Louisiana. Largely due to their leadership the amendment passed the Senate. It was killed in conference, and while we are disappointed over this action, at the same time we win a definite victory by demonstrating that the Senate favors a decrease in rates and will not yield to the Postmaster-General's suggestion for a 75 per cent increase in the first and second zones at the present time. Colonel Ewing will outline the work ahead.

Consideration has been given a plan proposing that newspaper advertising audits be standardized and safeguarded similarly as are newspaper circulation operations unified through the A. B. C. Major J. S. Cosen, of Atlanta, as chairman of a special committee investigating this subject, has given it considerable time and thought and you will hear his findings, and probably desire discussion of the general idea.

Major Cohen is likewise chairman of the editorial affairs committee. It has been relatively inactive simply because, for some unexplained reasons, editorial matters are not referred to the Association for discussion or handling. We certainly must have editorial problems of a common character, and I do urge that during coming years we utilize the collective strength of the Association for "upstairs" affairs just as fully and freely as we now discuss business office matters for the mutual good.

During the year your Association has become an incorporated body. By-laws for its conduct have also been prepared. Secretary Johnson, with Messrs, Hanson, Giovannoli and Potts, of your Board, and with fine co-operation from the Secretaries and Managers of similar organizations, have served you well in this regard, and I urge the adoption of their report.

Our Agency Relations Committee always remains anonymous. Its activities this year have gone along unceasingly and uninterruptedly, and with efficiency and dispatch. The basis of the committee's activities has been the report adopted at your last convention. The fact that the year has been free from quarrel and contention, I may immodestly state, is somewhat of a tribute to the thoroughness of our previous actions. To these "workers in the dark" I know you will privilege me extending your warm appreciation and thanks.

From all the foregoing, it is obvious that your President has been peculiarly and particularly favored with marvelously competent committeemen. The chairman of your Board, Past-President Victor H. Hanson, has time and again aided magnificently with his wisdom and his work, and each and every one of your directors have responded faithfully and fully to every request for cooperation and coordination. The Board met several times during the year. We have had our little "family" disagreements and discussions, but I am well within the truth in reporting that from the viewpoint of the greatest good for the greatest number your Board has been most faithful to its trust. To each and all of them I express my profound personal thanks, as well as, those of the body general.

I have purposely delayed for the final portion of this report reference to my dear friend, Walter C. Johnson, secretary-treasurer of our Association. Although this is being dictated weeks ahead of convention time, in the quiet of my own office, I fail for words with which to adequately express the breadth and depth of my appreciation of Mr. Johnson's great service and sacrifice for the newspapers of the South.

I have been affiliated with many organizations, commercial and fraternal, but never have I seen anyone give so freely and fully, so efficiently and energetically of himself for the good of others as has Walter Johnson.

It is therefore with profound regret, and yet with a sense of fairness to his own private affairs, that I am forced to announce his determination to retire from the active duties of manager and secretary-treasurer of the S. N. P. A.

We have had Mr. Johnson in harness for eight years. Certainly it would ill become us to register our appreciation of his wonderful contribution to the common good by attempting to force him to continue in office at a sacrifice of the best interest of his family and private affairs.

The time has come, therefore, when we must employ, at a proper salary, to be determined by your incoming officers and Board, a paid Manager for this Association. If this is agreeable, Mr. Johnson has been persuaded to retain the title Secretary-Treasurer during the coming year, and will accept responsibility for the thorough training of a new Manager for the Association.

It has been a great privilege; a great pleasure, and a great honor to have served you during the year. A good bit of work and a good bit of worry goes along with the distinction, but the fun of fellowship and the satisfaction of service 'way overbalance all else.

I thank you.

ARTHUR G. NEWMYER,
President.

BIG ADVERTISING DELEGATION OFF TO WEMBLEY

Republic First to Sail and Occasion is Made Bright by Unusual Features—Large Passenger List on Lancastria—Fun Aboard Ship

SEVEN liners sailed from different ports in the United States and the Dominion of Canada this week, carrying 1,800 American and Canadian delegates to the 20th international convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, to be held in London, England, July 13 to 18.

At about the same time, the movement to Britain was underway in all parts of the world.

From India, Hawaii, South Africa, New Zealand, Australia, Belgium, France, Norway, Holland, Sweden, Italy, and Czechoslovakia, representatives of the advertising fraternity turned towards England to confer on the latest developments in their profession, to lay plans for the future, and to hear opinions of the world's successful business men and advertising experts.

Officials, sailing from New York, estimated the total attendance would be well over 7,000.

Greatest excitement in this country centered in New York, from which city the S. S. Republic sailed Wednesday and the S. S. Lancastria Thursday. These are the two official boats charted by the A. A. C. W. for exclusive use of convention delegates. Five hundred and twenty-five were aboard the first ship sailing, and 500 were on the Lancastria. Crowds lined the piers to wave farewell.

A "bon voyage" of unique character was wished on the advertising men and women sailing on these two liners.

The London Daily Mail arranged to have a sky-writer circle the boats as they sailed down the bay, inscribing in smoke "Daily Mail" in the sky.

Representatives of New England advertising clubs and newspapers numbering 275, left from Boston on the S. S. Samaria, while a Texas delegation of 150, sailed from Houston on the S. S. LaSalle; and 250 delegates from the middle west and Canada chose Montreal as their embarkation point, and the S. S. Montcalm as their ship. The remaining 100 delegates were to sail on the S. S. Leviathan and George Washington.

Lou Holland, A. A. C. W. president, was a passenger on the S. S. Republic. On this ship, as on the Lancastria, because they are the official boats, elaborate plans were made for entertainment of the delegates during the passage, which will end with a typical British "Royal Welcome" at Southampton, July 12.

Rowe Stewart, business manager of the Philadelphia Record, is in charge of entertainment on board the Republic, while Rollin C. Ayres, San Francisco advertising man, arranged the program for the Lancastria.

No detailed plans of entertainment were announced before sailing, and, although the American delegates will be on the water July 4, no special celebration was on the program.

Care has been taken by the program makers not to bore passengers by over entertainment. Different advertising clubs will take charge each day.

Radio concerts will be sent to the ship daily by the Wanamaker broadcasting station, Philadelphia, special receiving apparatus having been installed. A club paper will be published each day during the voyage.

To make last minute plans for entertainment during and after the convention in England, Eric Field, director of Erwoods Limited, London, and A. H. Williams, sales and advertising manager of Selfridges, were passengers on the Republic and Lancastria respectively. Williams must have his little joke, and announced just before sailing, that he had arranged to have 600 corkscrews given to passengers on the Republic, bearing the following tag:

"Deepest sympathy from the Lancastria bunch—Ha! Ha!"

That women will have an important place in the convention is demonstrated by the fact that of the total of 1,800, 40 per cent are women. Of the 40 per cent, 50 per cent are business women, and the remainder wives of the delegates.

First of her sex to represent in Europe the women's advertising clubs of the United States, is Miss Katherine H. Mahool, of Baltimore, who sailed on the Lancastria. She is the only member of the executive board of the international organization. This is considered the highest honor that can be conferred upon a woman in the advertising field, since it is awarded by the vote of all affiliated women's clubs.

Miss Mahool has risen rapidly in her profession. Her first job consisted of addressing envelopes in the office of a belting company at $6 a week.

So in 1920, with experience in several agencies, in a department store and with a manufacturer, she decided she knew enough of the game to paddle her own canoe. From the beginning she was successful.

Three years ago she was elected president of the Women's Advertising Club of Baltimore. She was reelected a second year. Two years ago she was chosen for the post on the executive board of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, and was reelected last year.

The passenger list of the Republic includes a number of the most prominent people in the advertising field. Among them are:

E. J. Barklow, of the Gerlach-Barklow Company; Wm. J. Betting of Redfield, Fisher and Wallace; Mrs. Bernice Blackwood, executive secretary of the Advertising Specialty Association; W. J. Boardman, of George Batton Company; Homer J. Buckley of Buckley, Dement & Co.; George M. Burlach of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch; Bennett Chapple, advertising manager of the American Rolling Mills Company; Paul T. Cherington, marketing expert of the J. Walter Thompson Company.

HOW NEWSPAPERS COVERED LORAIN DISASTER IN DARKNESS

Reporters and Photographers Battle to Get Facts from Destroyed City—Artist Donahey Makes Sketch and Carries It to Cleveland in Automobile

By J. H. WEBB

CLEVELAND, June 30.—Disaster—swift, sudden and unexpected—rode across northern Ohio on the wings of a twisting, snarling tornado Saturday afternoon, June 28. It ripped a jagged patch out of the heart of Sandusky, took a 25-mile jump along the southern Lake Erie shore to beat Lorain to a mass of ruins, lashed out of Cleveland and Akron in passing and went swirling off to the east, striking at Youngstown, Erie and Pittsburgh before it streamed off to the Alleghenies.

In its wake the tornado left nearly 100 dead, 300 persons injured and property loss valued at $30,000,000.

Covering the storm swept zone was about the toughest newspaper job Cleveland and other northern Ohio newspaper men have encountered in many years.

Most of the death toll, injured and property loss was in Lorain, a city of 30,000.

News of the storm trickling into Cleveland did not give newspapers any idea of the magnitude of the disaster until nearly 7 o'clock Saturday evening. All wires from the storm-swept zone were cut off. No power and lights were available in Lorain, Sandusky and other points. It was a case of "get the news" the best way possible and get it quick.

The first Cleveland newspaper man to get a detailed story about Lorain's disaster was John W. Love, industrial editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer. He got into Lorain with his auto before the rush of the curious and found a telephone connection with Cleveland at Dover, O., about 10 p. m.

Staff photographers, reporters and sketch artists were rushed to the swept zone by the score Saturday night, but all work had to be carried on in darkness. Making pictures, which were carried by Cleveland's Sunday morning newspapers, was a heroic feat in some instances. Flash lights were used. Sketch artists and cartoonists worked by auto spot lights, hand flash lights and other limited means of illumination.

But the big story was covered completely for the Sunday papers.

The Cleveland Plain Dealer Sunday set up a "working shop" in the Lorain telephone exchange building, got typewriters and began "shooting" copy into Cleveland by wire.

All news printed in the Sunday morning early editions of the Sunday News-Leader, Plain Dealer, and special editions of Cleveland Press and News before midnight Saturday night were either telephoned from outside the wind-swept zone or the writers of the stories returned by automobile to their Cleveland offices.

The Lorain Journal and Times-Herald, were without power to operate their presses. One of them got out its first extra from a printing office in Elyria.

One newspaper man was injured. Robert J. Snadjr, special feature writer for the Plain Dealer Sunday magazine, was caught in the tornado zone. A tree was blown down on his machine and he was taken to an Elyria hospital. His injuries are painful, but not serious.

Signed stories for the Plain Dealer were written by Fred Charles, John W. Love, Philip W. Porter, J. H. Doanahey. cartoonist, Ralph J. Donaldson, and others.

Jack Heil, Len Schneider and others wrote special stories for the Press and some mighty good photograph work was done by Edward Dork and Clarence Stieglitz, Press staff photographers, the latter making some good shots from an airplane.

Drawing Showing Lorain (O.) Disaster

More newspaper "art" was used in Cleveland papers Monday than perhaps before in the history of modern newspaper photography and quick reproduction. The Press got out a Sunday extra. The "seven o'clock" editions of the Plain Dealer and Sunday Leader-News fairly bristled with photographs taken under remarkable conditions.

Byron Filkins, staff photographer for the News and News-Leader, did some quick, good work. The News carried four pages of photographs of the wrecked zone Monday noon. Similar space was given pictures in the Press.

Nearly every Ohio newspaper had special representatives in the storm zone.

Ed L. Ways, Sandusky correspondent for the Plain Dealer, being unable to get any wire to his paper Saturday night, caught a train and rushed to the newspaper office 60 miles away and wrote a "complete cover" of the situation at Cedar Point, Ohio's famous summer and convention resort. The "Point" escaped with slight damage.

J. H. Donahey, cartoonist for the Cleveland Plain Dealer, and brother of governor A. V. Donahey, of Ohio, made one of the first pictures of the wrecked business section of Lorain published in an Ohio newspaper.

Lorain was in darkness, save for lights flickering from auto, fire engine, and ambulance headlights, torches, and hand flash lights.

Photographers on the scene got doubtful results. Some of the reporters were "lost" as it were, and the Plain Dealer, before going to press on last editions was clamoring for art.

Cartonist Donahey followed a fire truck into the heart of Lorain. He drove his car behind the fire truck, which was sent to the stricken city.

But he found no lights which would enable him to do any drawing. Finally, kneeling by the side of an ambulance which was being filled with dead and injured victims of the storm, he sketched on white paper, by the lights of the ambulance, a rough draft.

Later by wandering about the heart of the city he got his outline for the buildings and sky line in Broadway, the city's main thoroughfare. The sketch showed the street looking northward, a few hours after the storm. Hurrying to Cleveland in his car with rough pencil drawings, he worked out a complete picture. The result was "A Vivid Picture of Stricken Lorain."

Seek Best Editorials

To encourage effective editorial writing The Washington Newspaper, published by the School of Journalism, University of Washington, now runs a column called "Worth While Editorials," which is a reprint of the best editorials to be found in newspapers during the month. Newspapers thus honored in the last issue of that publication were: Yakima Herald, Christian Science Monitor, Wenatchee World and Cle Elum Miner-Echo.

Macfadden Leases Plant

The lease of the twelve-story printing building and the adjoining one-story building, formerly the home of the New York Evening Mail, is reported to have been sold by Henry L. Stoddard as president of the Mail and Express Company to Bernarr Macfadden. The publication of a new daily newspaper this fall is contemplated by Mr. Macfadden. The lease held by the Mail and Express Company calls for a rental of $25,000 a year until Dec. 1, 1927. The property is owned by the City of New York.

MENCKEN SEES "RICH AND DECENT" PRESS

Caustic Critic of Newspapers Freely Expresses Opinion, Saying "Purity Pays"—News Writers Need Self-Respect — Skeptical of Schools and Regards Clubs as Insult

By WARREN BASSETT

One of the most out-spoken, at times bitter, critics of the American newspaper as today conducted is Henry L. Mencken, of the Baltimore Sun and American Mercury. EDITOR & PUBLISHER this week requested this brilliant, caustic, fretful, abusive, fault-finder to grant an interview and "shoot the wad," as it were, without reservation.—EDITOR.

"NEWSPAPERS are getting rich, and for that reason they are getting respectable."

Doctor Mencken—Henry L., of the Baltimore Sun and the American Mercury, had completed the dissection of American journalism for a class of one, and after viewing the remains pronounced the above verdict. But like most doctors he did not wish to alarm the relatives. The entire truth about newspapers he said, was unprintable.

"For the most part they are quacks and charlatans.

"But in all seriousness they are improving, and for a curious reason—they are getting rich. When a man gets rich he refuses to be bought. He can afford to be virtuous. So it is with the newspapers of today.

"The joker is, that having got rich they have got pure—and they are surprised to find that it pays!"

The scene of the dissection was the club room in the basement of Madison Square Garden provided by the New York World and Baltimore Sun for newspaper men covering the national Democratic convention. It was crowded with news writers representing the best talent in the country. Some slouched in wicker chairs reading. Others stood in close groups discussing the latest absurdity which had occurred on the convention floor. The lunch counter was lined three deep. A chevaux de frise of outstretched arms reached for free sandwiches and beer. Voices boomed. Papers rustled. And vibrating raucously from the black radio horn came the powerful voice of some unknown, unheeded Democratic Demosthenes imitating Tennyson's brook on the convention platform.

Mencken had come down for a sandwich and a cup of coffee. He was not doctor then, but raconteur. At every step he stopped either to tell or to listen to some convention drollery . . . . a little, compact man, with a roundish face shaded by a round white panama with a round turned up brim. A dark suit. No insignia of any kind in the lapel. Naturally.

For the information of Main Street there was no visible halo of devils about his head. The most vitriolic of America's critics was in affable mood.

The convention was a fantastic mob spectacle for the amusement of the sophisticated.

A man in a white jacket gave Mencken coffee and a sandwich which he disposed of while giving EDITOR & PUBLISHER his views on the American newspaper of today.

Presented with a subject Mencken's manner becomes that of a surgeon. He is a fast, deft worker. With the first question he had figuratively rolled up sleeves, donned operating room garb, pulled the sheet from the subject and began the lecture.

And it was more lecture than interview for Mencken is a crisp, direct speaker. He does not fumble for words. His talk is like writing. It is easy to visualize even the punctuation. Steely phrases turn flip-flops on a mat of paragraphs. Most of them are corroded with disillusion.

But one learned early that Doctor Mencken was demonstrating not in the clinic but in the dissecting room, for in the clinic it is usually thought best to let the patient survive.

It is through the rich proprietors, he declared, that improvement has come to American newspapers.

This curious picture of Henry L. Mencken was made a short time ago, when the brilliantly sarcastic writer was dubbed "Boss of Baltimore." It is not a good portrait, but for reasons of his own, Menken highly esteems this picture

"Most of the bellowing against the wealthy publishers is being done by people who don't remember the old days 25 years ago," he said.

"When I started, 85 per cent of the newspapers were for sale to anyone who had the cash to buy them.

"The first paper I worked on was a public blackmailer and criminal. It invented fakes to hold up people. Today this situation is exceedingly rare. Newspapers were poor then. Like a poor man they could not afford to be squeamish.

"Until a newspaper is beyond the bread and butter stage it is no better than a street-walker.

"Modern dailies are not so picturesque as those of the old days. They are duller, but infinitely better. Even party passion is disappearing. But newspaper men as a class have not risen to the dignity of their bosses.

"Today they are professionally on a par with dentists. They have not yet reached the level of judges. As I think of it, they seem more comparable to paying tellers in a bank. There are certain things they will not do, but they will almost always do what they are ordered to.

"What newspaper men need is such a body of self respect and doctrine that it will be impossible for shyster newspapers to operate. Papers then would be in the same position as hospitals. If they were run by quacks and frauds methods would be used to make them so publically notorious that no one would work for them."

According to Mencken, ignorance and lack of dignity pervades the newspaper profession today. And he holds that this is more dangerous than actual corruption. Coupled with this is the lack of a true professional spirit.

"What the newspaper profession needs most is better men—men with a sense of dignity and a true professional spirit," he declared. "To get them seems to be the hardest problem.

"Will they come from the journalism schools which have sprung up so abundantly in the past few years? They may, but I doubt it. The greatest problem of the journalism schools is to get competent men to teach. If men like the late Frank I. Cobb, or Herbert Bayard Swope would consent to become instructors it would accomplish something. But such men never do. That is why I am skeptical of the schools.

"Even the best teachers never teach. They just stand around and let their pupils watch them. In all higher education the true relation is not that of teacher and pupil, but that of master and apprentice."

If city and managing editors realized this they could better the newspaper profession, according to Mencken. They should definitely train reporters in the work of getting and recording the day's news.

They should tell them out of their own experience what to do when certain situations arise—what is professional and what unprofessional.

"There is too little of this done," Mencken asserted. "These executives will tell you they are too busy to train 'cubs.' This is untrue. They spend too much time answering telephone calls from idiots.

"Another objection heard is that once you have trained a man he immediately steps out and gets a better job. This only demonstrates the lack of professional spirit in journalism. When a medical student is graduated he enters a hospital as an interne. Older surgeons give him the benefit of their experience and skill although they know that within a year or two he is going out to set up in business for himself. Lawyers, too, aid each other.

"It is imperative that we get a professional spirit into this work. The union scheme will not apply for it puts news men on a lower level instead of a higher.

"The union idea is wrong because it demands protection for incompetents and puts them on the same level as competent workmen."

To illustrate poignantly how city editors can influence the ethical standards of reporters, Mencken declared that as city editor of the Baltimore Herald in his early days he once fired a man for getting a scoop by reprehensible methods. He believes reporters should be taught that it is better to miss a story than get it dishonestly. When this idea becomes prevalent, and when reporters are given definite training, journalism will have taken a long stride ahead.

Although editorial ethics have improved slightly in the past 25 years, it is the business department which has purged itself, Mencken asserted. The ad takers have outstripped their city room co-workers. It is hard to find a business manager who will go upstairs and ask the editor to print free publicity, he said, but it is still harder to find the editor who would make any protest to such a request were it made.

Perhaps in his mind Mencken associated the existence of press clubs with the low professional spirit of reporters and editors, for he reserved his most prodigious sniff for these organizations.

"Press clubs are an insult to decent men," he said. "They are supported by bootleggers, cheap politicians, press agents, and other riff-raff who expect to be paid in publicity for their contact with newspaper men. Press clubs are founded on the idea that journalism is for sale for a drink of liquor.

"There is absolutely no reason why news men should have a club if they can't pay for it. And there is no more reason why laymen should belong to a newspaper men's club than to the County Medical Association. Newspaper men ought not to associate with politicians any more than judges should associate with pickpockets."

Despite the barely concealed note of cynicism in his attitude toward newspaper men, Mencken is convinced their product is getting better. Incorruptible dailies exist today, which no amount of money or influence can buy. Shyster papers may spring up occasionally, he said, but they never get very far.

He strongly doubts that newspaper men will ever lose their horror of the uplift. Whatever improvement has occurred already in journalism has come about independently and without their assistance, he stated. A few outstanding personalities helped, but the profession in general was inert. His own critical diatribes, which he has been writing for years, have amounted to an elegantly formed zero, he is certain. He has played Simon Legree to modern journalism. But Uncle Tom will neither die nor reform.

Mencken has spent all of his working years in journalism. He has been through the newspaper mill from cub reporter to editor. He began on the Baltimore Morning Herald in 1899 at the age of 19. In 1903 he was made city editor. In 1905 he was named editor of the Evening Herald. He joined the Baltimore Sun in 1906 and has been connected with that daily ever since. At present he devotes the greater part of his time to editing the American Mercury with George Jean Nathan, his position on the Sun being that of a member of the Council. From 1914 until the fall of the year he was co-editor with Nathan of the Smart Set.

WEST TENNESSEE ORGANIZED

Editors and Publishers Perfect an Association with Second Section Due in September

Twenty-five editors and publishers of Tennessee papers met at Jackson, June 20, and reorganized the West Tennessee Press Association. The officers were: A. J. Sander, Martin, president, and Allison Simonton, Covington, secretary-treasurer.

The meeting was called to order in the supreme court room by Harris Brown, editor Jackson Sun, who welcomed the newspaper men to the city. Mayor John R. Rison, Jr., of the Parisian (Paris), responded to the address of welcome following his selection as chairman.

Permanent organization was then effected and a round table discussion of country newspaper problems. Several speakers pointed out that the weekly press is losing much of its prestige on account of the lack of editorial enterprise.

It was further suggested that the business side of the country press was over emphasized and much of community development was being lost.

Jackson will be the next meeting place. The association will convene again Friday, September 12. An auto ride was given the visitors following the adjournment.

$3.50 NEWSPRINT NOW RUMORED AND DENIED

Persistent Reports That Further Price Reduction is Due Are Not Admitted by Trade Authorities

FURTHER reduction in newsprint prices loomed as a possibility this week, despite the fact that two leading paper manufacturers promptly denied a report that contracts were being quietly made at $3.50 per cwt.

A reliable EDITOR & PUBLISHER informant had stated that $3.50 was to be the price in some quarters effective July 1.

International Paper Company was emphatic in its denial. A. R. Graustein, recently elected president, issued the following brief statement:

"When the rumor that there was to be a further reduction in the price of newsprint was called to the attention of officers of the International Paper Company, it was stated emphatically that they had no knowledge whatever of any impending reduction."

International recently announced to clients a cut of $2 a ton, the reduction being specifically from $3.75 per cwt. to $3.65 per cwt. Pejepscot had been one of the first newsprint concerns to bolt from the $3.75 price.

The Great Northern Paper Company has not made any change from the $3.75 price as contracted the first of this year. It was understood that this price was definitely established for 1924 and would not fluctuate.

Despite the firm price policy held by the larger and stronger paper makers, the lesser concerns, authorities agree, are very apt to drop their prices to lower levels. In some instances foreign newsprint has sold this year at a price as much as 25 cents per cwt. lower than American manufacturers.

It is known that William Randolph Hearst has long been clamoring for the $3.50 figure. That he may succeed in obtaining his objective is conceded a possibility by certain authorities. One report is that he has closed at that price, effective July 10.

Production, which to a certain extent sets prices, was high during the past year, and now a curtailment of newsprint making is under way.

"We have stopped manufacturing newsprint at Glens Falls, Fort Edward, Glen and Wilder mills for the time being, and plan to shut down practically all the mills during the week of July 4.

"We do this with great reluctance, and only because we have been forced to do it. We had to do it because there are more than enough newsprint machines on the continent to produce all the newsprint, which the newspapers will buy, to say nothing of the fact that there is a substantial amount of newsprint being brought in from Europe.

"As a result we are forced to cut down our production to what we can sell. We have been producing a little more than we are selling, but we cannot keep on doing that. We are confident, however, that we shall not be forced to any more drastic curtailment than that now contemplated.

"We do not know just how soon we shall be able to resume full production. We do know that the history of the business shows that more and more paper is being used, and we hope it will not be very long before we can again start these machines."

Extend Copyright Treaty

A reciprocal copyright arrangement has been concluded between the United States and the Union of South Africa, effective July 1, 1924.

The arrangement was brought about by a Presidential proclamation signed June 26, and a proclamation by the Governor General of the Union of South Africa, published in that Government's official gazette, June 13.

Theft of "Gold Bear Trophy" Attempted

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

LONDON, July 2.—A daring attempt was made yesterday to steal the A. A. C. W. convention "Gold Bear Trophy," which was on display in the window of the Cunard Line offices on Cockspur.

Police arrested a seaman, who gave the name of Hunt. He was taken to the Bow street court, where he was charged with theft and window breakage.

"If I had another 5 minutes I should have got away with it," Hunt told police. He said he had planned to sell the trophy for £1,800.

The man was committed for trial in a higher court and the trophy returned undamaged.

The "Gold Bear Trophy" was sent to England April 2, on board the S. S. "Berengaria." The gift of G. Herb Palin, a prominent America advertising man and is presented each year to the convention city.

CHENERY RESIGNS

Leaves Editorship of New York Telegram and Evening Mail

William L. Chenery this week resigned the editorship of the New York Telegram and Evening Mail, which he has held since the merger of the two newspapers by Frank Munsey. No successor has been appointed.

Prior to his position on the Telegram and Evening Mail, Chenery was managing editor of the New York Sun and Globe, and associate editor and acting editor of the old New York Globe. He had been with the Munsey organization only since the publisher's purchase of the Globe. He has no plans for the future.

Chenery started newspaper work in 1910 on the Chicago Evening Post as special writer and reporter. He has also been connected with the Denver Rocky Mountain News, and the Chicago Herald.

Ellis Alleges Patent Infringement

Theodore T. Ellis, publisher of the Worcester Telegram and the Worcester Evening Gazette, was a witness before Judge Lowell in the federal court at Boston, June 26, in a patent suit brought by Ellis and his brother, Frank E. Ellis, against Frank G. Paige and the Tingue Brown Company of New Yoork, for alleged infringement. The suit, which seeks injunctions against the defendant, centres around alleged infringement on a printers' blanket patent, owned by the plaintiffs. The evidence in the case was highly technical, and a section of a newspaper press was taken into court to illustrate the use of the printers' blanket in question.

Newspaper Air Service in Operation

Daily airplane service between New York and Dixville Notch, N. H., for newspaper distribution purposes, was inaugurated this week by the J. J. Lannin Company, owners of The Balsams, a hotel at the New Hampshire resort. By this airplane method newspapers reach Dixville about 9 A. M. of the morning they are published instead of late afternoon the day following. Three aviators and three planes constitute the service corps.

New Air Mail Service

This week marked the opening by the government of a coast to coast air mail service. On July 1, aviators left San Francisco and New York expecting to span the continent in 35 hours. The first letter deposited in San Francisco was addressed to President Coolidge. It was mailed by M. H. DeYoung, publisher of the San Francisco Chronicle, and thanked the executive for inaugurating a means of bringing the Government closer to the Western public.

MILWAUKEE JOURNAL COLLECTS $8,000 RAIN INSURANCE ON ADS

Dismal Downpour Brings No Gloom to Daily or Advertisers —System Builds Linage But Is Costly, Gwaltney Says—Describes Plan

By HARRY GWALTNEY

Classified Advertising Manager, Milwaukee Journal

THE Milwaukee Journal has just collected $8,000 on a rain insurance policy covering a real estate special edition. This was the first edition ever insured by a newspaper, according to Green Brothers and Hanson, underwriters. A brief account was carried by Associated Press and since then inquires from other publishers have been pouring in. To answer the many questions asked and many more that have not been sent to us, we offer the following facts on our insured real estate edition:

Rain insurance on its real estate edition was taken out by the Milwaukee Journal not as a circus sales talk proposition nor as a wild gamble to increase lineage, but as a sound step in business to protect its advertisers from a loss of normal returns on their advertising.

In other years uncertain weather did not delay the official opening of Milwaukee's real estate market. Real estate operators spent thousands of dollars in their efforts to win early trade and to break the slump of winter. We had published full page after full page and on several occasions rain ruined the opportunity real estate men otherwise would have had of cashing in on their advertising. Unlike retail stores, which often win trade when crowds run for shelter in a shower, these men lost a large share of their advertising investment.

Realizing that the growth of the city, the whole building industry and the stimulus such activity gives all business the Journal seriously wanted to see its advertisers get as much from their advertising as they possibly could. Insurance against rain seemed our only method.

The question universally asked by interested publishers who have heard of our insurance is what did it mean to the paper? We can answer that briefly.

This insurance along with improved methods enabled us to increase our lineage 60 per cent over the 1923 record. It made possible a cut in cost of production estimated at nearly $200. And further it won good will that could not be obtained in any other way.

In other years real estate men had been holding copy until the last hour and then it was released not for the space they really wanted to use—but in the least possible space. They did not want to risk too much on uncertain weather.

This year the story was different. Copy was received from 3 days to 3 weeks before closing dates. Advertisers who had been using half page advertisements in other editions felt free to use larger copy because the Journal had assumed their risk. Lineage jumped from 30,000 to 49,000. The entire increase, however, was not attributed solely to the insurance feature, although it did serve as a stimulant to salesmen and as an assurance of results for advertisers. From the cost angle, an even more interesting situation occurred. The last minute rush of copy which had been the rule in former years was practically done away with. Overtime charges for composition showed a drop from $510 to $342.

This economy considered along with the increase in lineage actually reduced the cost of obtaining advertising. The fact that it did rain and the policy was collectible made the cost figure lower than on any special ever published by the Journal.

The most important result of the insurance was the good will won by protecting advertisers. It is easy to imagine the advertiser who had spent $500 to introduce a new sub-division as he looked out Sunday afternoon and saw the rain. In other years he realized that people could not wade through his muddy paths and appreciate the value of the land. His time and effort and money were practically wasted. This year he saw the rain, but knew that his money was not spent. He was to receive a second insertion of the advertisement at the expense of the insurance company and he was to have the advantage of his property explained to people not once, but twice.

There are other advantages both to advertiser and to publisher which might be cited—but no publisher should forget that the rain insurance is costly, it is liable to increase the cost of doing business, and that it is not applicable to every special edition. It can be purchased for certain specials on a business basis to protect and to build but it can not be bought for all occasions unless it is taken as an outright gamble.

An objection that has been brought up to our plan of insuring the real estate number of the Journal is that the risk is assumed by a person not profiting from the results obtained. The real estate operator, if he considers his affairs of sufficient importance to be protected against unfavorable weather, should assume the cost of insurance and not the newspaper which would probably continue to receive copy from him until the property is sold.

Whether it will be done in the future is still a question. We feel that realtors have been shown the value of the insurance and that hereafter they will be more than willing to bear the burden that is rightly theirs.

EDWARD RASCOVAR DIES

Famous Financial News Service Editor Started as Reporter

Edward Rascovar, 55, who died at his home in Cedarhurst, L. I., July 1, was for many years associated with the New York News Bureau, and president of that organization up to a few months ago. Mr. Rascovar began newspaper work on the old New York Daily News. Subsequently he joined the news staff of the New York Press, and later came to the New York Times as dramatic critic.

Sports Writers Organize

The International Sport Writers' Federation, which will comprise all the existing sporting writers' associations and those to be created in the future, was organized in Paris, July 1. Twenty-one nations were represented at the congress at which the movement was adopted. The organization plans to establish world-wide credentials so that sporting writers journeying to other countries may enjoy equal privileges in reporting sporting events with native correspondents. Franz Reichel, general secretary of the French Olympic Committee was elected president, and Ted Meredith of the United States vice-president.

Pressmen Oppose Convict Labor

Printing Pressmen's Union 67 of Boston has adopted a resolution demanding that state officials call a halt on the plans of the commission on administration to establish a printing plant at the Massachusetts state prison, Charlestown, thus "debasing an honorable craft by competition with convict labor." The business welfare of the Commonwealtth, the resolution states, demands that the printing of the state should be executed by legitimate printing houses, whether of the open or closed shop type.

STORY OF BIG MADISON SQUARE ASSIGNMENT

Correspondents Fight Hot Weather and Difficult Deadlock Conditions at Democratic Meet—Many Leave to Cover Cleveland Convention

WITH the Democratic National Convention still deadlocked when EDITOR & PUBLISHER went to press this week, wide open spaces began to appear in the press section at Madison Square Garden.

This was probably due to 3 reasons:

1.—The opening of the "conference for progressive political action" in Cleveland, July 4.

2.—The fact that during the balloting many reporters had to be on the convention floor among the various state delegations.

3.—The attractiveness of the Convention Club for Newspaper Men, provided by the New York World and the Baltimore Sun in the Garden basement.

They hated to leave New York with the vote undecided, and, at the same time, considered the gathering of 800 to 1,000 delegates on July 4 and 5 in Cleveland to nominate a Presidential candidate important enough to warrant their presence in that city.

By late Wednesday afternoon, when Democratic delegates had cast more than 30 ballots, at least two score political writers had signified their intention to Jim Preston, superintendent in charge of the Senate Press Galleries, who is in charge of seating arrangements, that they would leave that night for Cleveland.

Preston himself found it impossible to leave Madison Square Garden. As usual, he is the indispensible assistant to the newspaper men covering the powwow. William J. Donaldson will represent the standing committee in charge of press arrangements, at the July 4 convention.

The Associated Press will be represented in Cleveland by M. E. Coleman of the Chicago bureau, R. J. Durstman, of the Columbus, O., bureau, Paul F. Haupert, of the Washington bureau, J. W. McGuire of the Cleveland bureau and others on the Cleveland A. P. staff. Haupert is the only one of the number who represented the A. P. at the Democratic convention.

Paul Mallon of the United Press left New York Wednesday evening for Cleveland. The Cleveland bureau manager was to assist him. If possible Robert Bender and Raymond Clapper, of the United Press and United News respectively, were also to go.

George Durno, Kenneth Clark and William K. Hutchinson of the International News Service left New York in time for the Cleveland convention.

Others who had made arrangements to cover the Cleveland convention, leaving New York for the purpose were:

George Morris, New York Telegram; A. H. Kirchhofer, Buffalo News; H. B. Crozier, St. Paul Pioneer-Press; Arthur Evans and Philip Kingsley, Chicago Tribune; Mark Thistlewaite, Indianapolis News; Lucas Beecher, Toledo Blade; F. S. Buggie, Newark Star-Eagle; H. M. George, Detroit Free Press; Donald MacGregor, New York Evening Bulletin; J. G. Hayden, Detroit News; Frank R. Kent and John W. Owens, Baltimore Sun; and Carter Field and Boyden Sparks, New York Tribune.

L. C. Speers, New York Times; Arthur J. Sinnott, Newark News; Henry Suydam, Brooklyn Eagle; Maurice Judd and John Stuart, New York Sun; C. G. Ross and Paul Anderson, St. Louis Post-Dispatch; C. N. Wheeler and W. Bliss, Chicago Herald-Examiner; F. F. Shedd, Philadelphia Bulletin; David Lawrence Consolidated Press; and R. M. Ginter Pittsburg Gazette-Times.

When the EDITOR & PUBLISHER representative went to the press section at the Madison Square Garden, Wednesday afternoon, seats nearest the speaker's platform were found to be as jammed as at the earlier sessions. These seats were occupied by the press associations and New York City newspaper representatives.

Back further the open spaces occurred in the ranks of the out-of-town and smaller newspapers. Some of these out-of-town newspapermen undoubtedly were circulating about on the convention floor, keeping in touch with their own State delegations. This is one of the hardest assignments at a convention, many agree.

Jackson Elliott and L. C. Probert were directing the Associated Press writers. Bender and Clapper were on deck for United Press and United News; while Faris and George C. Shore, directed the I. N. S. contingent.

Noiseless typewriters seemed more popular at this convention than ever before. Stubby pencils are slowly giving away to modern invention.

The noiseless typewriter was first introduced to a political convention by Probert of the A. P. at the Chicago gathering in 1920. Probert has been with the Associated Press 20 years this year. He is a veteran of 8 political conventions.

SEEN AND HEARD AT THE GARDEN

Hardest convention to cover and at the same time the most exciting and interesting convention on record, was the opinion of newspaper correspondents, many of whom will need long and restful vacations, following the pow-wow at Madison Square Garden.

In an old brown stone house at 49 East 25th street, used as an annex to the Madison Square Hotel, the news writers found their most difficult assignment—meetings of the platform and resolutions committee.

Starting last Tuesday, June 24 at 5 o'clock in the afternoon and continuing until Saturday afternoon, June 28, the committee hung up a record for time and endurance. Some of the newspaper men waiting outside locked doors for news, only slept 10 hours out of 3 days and nights of work.

The most experienced men, largely Washington correspondents were given this assignment. Since the Klan matter was considered so important, members of the resolutions committee hoped to keep the deliberations on the issue from the press. Members were sworn to secrecy. The best sort of news work was required to obtain copy.

James E. Duffy, of the New York Telegram and Evening Mail, one of the reporters on this arduous assignment, was only able to get 4 hours sleep out of a stretch of 50 hours continuous work. Duffy has been 20 years in newspaper work, 17 of which he has spent in New York. Reporting the meetings of the resolutions committee, he declared, was the hardest assignment he ever received.

After a rest Sunday, attention centered again on Madison Square Garden, when balloting commenced. A cool, refreshing breeze blew coats on most of the correspondents in the press section.

Carl Smith, representing the Portland (Ore.) Journal, was kept busy by a lively war within the Oregon delegation. Smith has been Washington correspondent for the Journal since 1915, having started to work for that newspaper in 1907.

Rodney F. Dutcher and Otis Peabody Swift were seeking feature stories on the convention for the United News.

T. D. Ranson sent copy to three newspapers, the Richmond Times-Dispatch, the Norfolk Ledger-Dispatch, and the Petersburg Progress-Index. He regularly represents these papers in Washington, D. C.

"I've been in newspaper work 20 years, and this convention is the first time I've suffered from blistered toes," mourned Fred B. Edwards who has been picking out the unique characters among delegates for feature stories for the New York Herald-Tribune. Edwards estimated that he talked to close to 1,000 delegates during the first week of the convention. And walking hotel corridors is no easy job, he opined.

Mrs. Henry Collins Brown, formerly a newspaper woman on the Syracuse Post-Standard, wrote special stories for the New York Evening Post. Her husband is director of the Museum of the City of New York.

N. O. Messenger, of the Washington (D. C.) Star, who was covering his 17th political convention, remarked on the "wonderful conveniences" provided in New York. It was the most difficult convention to forecast he had ever seen, he said. Messenger has seen 35 years of active newspaper work, 32 of which he has been on the same newspaper, the Star.

Among the prominent newspaper veterans was Col. Michael E. Hennessy of the Boston Globe. Hennessy is the man for whom Coolidge held up his special train, after he had taken the oath of office at Plymouth, Vt., and was speeding to Washington, following Harding's death. Coolidge, it was said, refused to go to Washington without Col. Hennessy.

Marc A. Rose, managing editor of the Buffalo Evening News, wrote a running story for his newspaper under the caption, "Looking On." Rose was celebrating his 20th year of continuous newspaper work and his fourth year on the News.

Walter W. Mills, conductor of the column "Don't Worry" on the Oklahoma City Times, was having a good time meeting New York Columnists, F. P. A., Don Marquis, and Heywood Broun. He conducted the "Conning Tower" on the New York World for F. P. A. one day as "guest conductor."

Excellent feature stories of the convention came from Westbrook Pegler, of United News. Pegler hunted up and obtained a corking yarn from Charles B. Lawlor, blind author or the song "The Sidewalks of New York."

"Aunt Sarah Gallop, age 187," was the creation of Frank Sullivan, humorist writer for the New York World. Aunt Sarah urged a resolution for stronger dondelion wine, and advised a prohibitive tariff on white nightgowns as a means of crushing the Ku Klux Klan. The poor old dear saved up her egg money for 20 years to come to the convention, and decided after all it was a horrible waste of energy.

The New York World prepared ballot records and distributed them with compliments to delegates and newspaper correspondents. Ballot score cards were also given away free with each copy of the New York Telegram and Evening Mail purchased at the convention hall. The Baltimore Sun published a score in its Monday edition for the use of radio fans.

Newspaper women were kept busy explaining away the action of Miss Marion Colley, delegate from Washington, Ga., who favored condemning the Ku Klux Klan, but exercised her womanly prerogative, and suddenly changed her mind to vote the other way last Saturday. Emma Bugbee of the New York Herald Tribune was one of Miss Colley's most earnest champions. Miss Colley herself once worked for the old New York Evening Mail.

Not to be outdone, perhaps, a man also changed his vote in the Klan fight. He was Pleasant A. Stovall, editor of the Savannah (Ga.) Press, and delegate at large from Savannah.

Andrew C. Erwin, another Georgia delegate, who was object of a demonstration in the convention Saturday, is editor of the Athens (Ga.) Banner-Herald. He appealed for denunciation of the Ku Klux Klan by name in the platform.

Column Conductor Mills of Oklahoma Tells How He Makes "Don't Worry" Feature—"Keep Well and Be Cheerful, With Both Eyes Open"

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

COLUMN conducting is on the increase, all agree; but why?

An answer came this week from Walter W. Mills, conductor of "Don't Worry," a column in the Oklahoma City Times. Mills is a stolid, healthy wit from "out where the west begins."

WALTER W. MILLS

"It's because there's so much blah being passed out these days," Mills believes, and explained how he fashions his daily stint to make it an efficient bunk deflator. He has been writing "Don't Worry" for the Times 6 years now, finding it "a delightful pursuit."

"Longfellow was good enough to tell us 'life is real, life is earnest,'" Mills confided with me this week, and added, "but, after all, life shouldn't be too earnest.

"All newspaper men," he continued, "learn in time to see the comic angles of things or should, and a large number of them soon wish to express this knowledge in a newspaper column.

"I don't know how its is elsewhere, but column conducting is on the increase in the Southwest. A number of newspapers in Kansas and Oklahoma have added columns to their regular run of copy. Not just the large dailies, the country papers are adopting it also.

"And the column conductors, by attacking bunk, seem to be making a hit with quite a following of readers. As I see it, a column's big asset to a newspaper is not in gaining new subscribers, but in making friends and holding circulation."

Mills afforded the writer his first view of a "Colyumist" from the Great Southwest. I decided, after talking with him a while, that a study of column conductor hobbies might prove interesting.

You see, so many columnists have exactly the same biographical backgrounds. They have reported a while; they have contributed to B. L. T. on the Chicago Tribune; they have read and re-read Mark Twain and Eugene Field; they have and continue to consume quantities of poetry; and they are given to writing jingles. Then, of a sudden, as if by magic, they take to being the wits of their towns or cities.

Hobbies might be different enough to be newsy. Thus a page might be given to F. P. A. on Tennis; Bugs Baer, On being a Movie Actor; Don Marquis On the Writing of Serious Plays, or Heywood Broun, On Bringing up H. B. III.

Mills' hobbies proved to be fishing, swimming and duck shooting. Entirely different, and therefore quite satisfactory. Perhaps his gunning aids his eye in the shots he aims at blah.

He is a tall blond, sun burned and muscular. He doesn't talk easily. Columnists evidently aren't supposed to be orators in Oklahoma. But, what he has to say, pried from an active mind, is worth attention.

As a matter of fact, outdoor activities with rod and gun seem to have given Mills a healthy point of view. Part of advice he gave to aspiring columists, indeed, was to keep fit.

"You can't be sensible, if you are bothered with indigestion," he cautioned. "Keeping fit, I believe, improves any man's attitude towards life. Keep well, and it's much easier to be cheerful.

"The province of a newspaper column, as I see it, is to apply common sense to the outpourings of bunk artists. Really there is so much blah in these United States today!

"A columnist needn't be too cynical, but he can very well see to it that a lot of hokum is deleted from news and current opinion. Above all things, he should soft pedal propraganda.

"The number of people who would fit in with Sinclair Lewis' character study of Mr. George F. Babbitt is large enough; but probably over-estimated. At any rate, even in the Main street cities, a fellow seemingly can get a fairly sensible following.

Mills doesn't deny larger city dailies have their attractions, but he discounts, to a certain extent, the almost general belief held on Manhattan Isle, at least, that New York is the mecca of all newspaper men, referred to from that largest city as "being out in the sticks."

"A columnist on a daily the size of the one I serve has a pleasing following in his own community. He doesn't become nationally known, of course, and his pay check doesn't run to high figures.

"In many ways, however, he is as well off as his better known brothers. His column is both appreciated and knocked by his small city readers. New York has its draw backs. It is too hard to get away from.

"Everywhere, I suppose, a columnist's followers are divided among those who wonder 'how he does it every day' and those who 'can't see how they pay a person for writing such tripe.' Perhaps columns appeal most to people who don't consider every chance a 'fighting chance.'

"Indeed, I'm not ashamed to say that I think running a column an ideal job, if, of course, one must work.

"Adams and Jay House tell me I work too hard. I write editorials as well as "Don't Worry." But I usually get through work in time to go to a ball game. Then every Monday I turn over my whole column to my contributors."

Isn't it hard to obtain ideas to run under so all-embracing a title as "Don't Worry" every day, every year in a small city? Mills was asked.

"Well, it's my experience," he replied, "that most ideas come from contacts and books. Of the two, contact with people is the most important. I try to mingle with all sorts of people. Good ideas for a column come from baseball crowds as well as from grand opera audiences.

"And it's a mighty good thing, I've found, for a columnist in small cities to do something different every once and a while. For instance, I served on a jury a short while ago, and had lots of fun at it, as well as finding fresh material for "Don't Worry."

"Then I attend State Legislature occasionally, and the recent meeting of the National Editorial Association in Oklahoma City had its points.

"A columnist, I think, should be reasonably conceited. He should project his own personality into his column. It is one of the claims he has on his readers."

A bunk writer, perhaps, might say it was by "personality and perserverance" that Walter W. Mills became columnist on the Oklahoma Times, and thereby found his "ideal job." Even as you and I, he started on a country newspaper, the Almena (Kan.) Plain Dealer. First he loafed around the office during vacations, doing everything the boss would let him, from setting type to selling advertising. When he had learned to write "allegedly" enough times in every story, he was made reporter, and has made newspapers a meal ticket since.

Sixteen years ago he began under the tutelage of E. W. Howe, the Atchinson (Kan.) Globe, he read Mark Twain and took to writing and paragraphs for the Globe's column "Globe Sights." It was as an editorial writer that he went to his present job, but he started the column in order to keep busy.

On the Oklahoma Times, he can now rightfully claim the authorship of more than 3,000 rhymes.

THE STEREOTYPER

There is a place where the metal's hot
And sweat is the drink of pride,
And whether it's first page, last or sports
Or Number 12 inside,
It all must pass where the pot awaits
The mat from the molding crew,
And lightning is slow to the casting room
When the starter plate goes through.

Antimony and lead and tin
And steam from the tables pace
The heart of the man who stands and waits
With sweat and grime on his face.
The form comes down to the waiting mat,
She's molded and dried and shot
To the muscled crew of the casting room
Where the soup is boiling hot.

A hundred tons to a press, they stand
In line for the plate that locks
Itself to the cylinder, when it comes
All trimmed from the casting box.
But they might wait in vain, and fret
For the word that will set them free,
We're't not for the Stereotyper bold,
And Boss of the Works is he!

You grimy giant, your horny hand!
A fist to your fist, say I!
Histories made in the plates you swing
As the mats come fluttering by!
And when you've finished your sweating toil
And given the job your best,
Then who shall grudge you a featherbed
And the sweets of a Toiler's rest?

MONTCLAIR HERALD FAILS

Receiver Appointed for New Jersey Daily on Employes' Motion

A receiver was appointed on July 1 for the Montclair Herald Company, Inc., publisher of the Montclair (N. J.) Herald, a daily, following the filing of an involuntary petition in bankruptcy by employes. Thomas Brunetto, of Montclair, was named receiver by Federal Judge Runyon at Newark, N. J. He was empowered to continue to run the business for ten days. The petition in bankruptcy gives the liabilities of the porporation as $25,000 and the assets $15,000.

The company, which was organized by Blanchard M. Preble, formerly of the Staten Island Advance, purchased the Herald, then a weekly, last November, and continued it as a weekly until February when it was changed to a daily paper.

Colorado Editors to Meet

The newspapers of Boulder, Colorado, the University of Colorado and the Boulder Chamber of Commerce are making elaborate preparations for the entertainment of more than 100 editors who are expected to attend the Annual Convention of the Colorado Editorial Association, to be held in that city, July 18 and 19. A trip into Boulder's famous glacier region, a beefsteak "fry," a dance, an organ recital, the annual stunt night of the University of Colorado, moonlight swimming and luncheons and breakfasts are part of the variety of entertainment offered the editors.

George Barn Baker has been appointed Director of Publicity for the Republican organization.

OLD FALLACY EXPLODED

Business Will Be Good Because People Go on Living

The Norristown (Pa.) Times-Herald, in an editorial says that it anticipates good business, Summer and Fall, for the following reasons:

"Because, in spite of the fact that we are going to have a national election and in spite of the fact that Summer months are warm, people are—

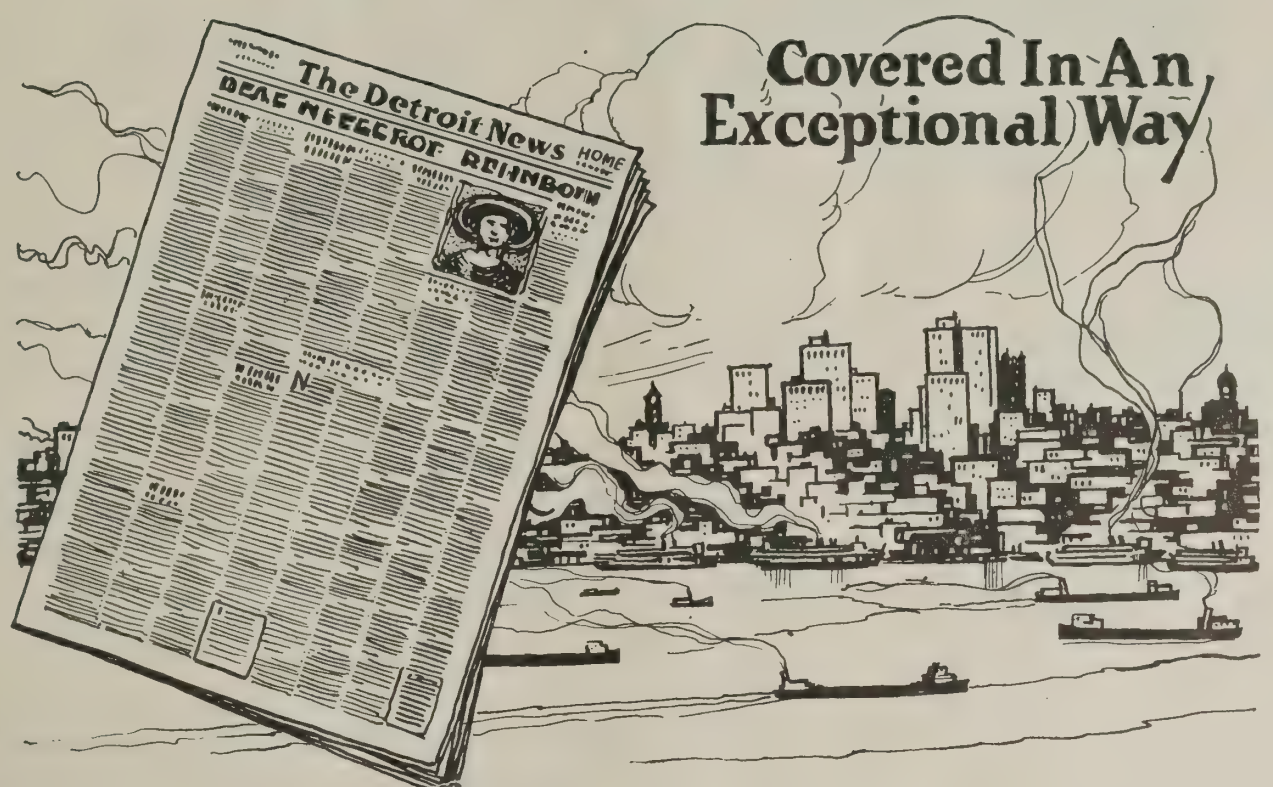
"Going to buy food, because they must eat; buy clothes, because they dress every day; need furniture; buy automobiles; buy insurance, because they need protection in July, as well as in January; in fact, there are few needs of Winter that do not find their counterpart in Summer."

This newspaper says that the age-old fallacy that business must be poor on election years and that people do not buy in Summer has been exploded.

PUBLISH EXTRA ON TRUCK

Altoona Tribune Prints Paper on Speedway by Motor Power

An enterprising move was made by the Altona (Pa.) Tribune when a "Special Speedway Extra" was published on the field at the Speedway during the progress of an automobile race.



The machines necessary for the publication were mounted on a truck which necessitated skill on part of the truck owners to set their transmission rod pulleys to the correct beat of their truck engine so that the correct speed for the machines could be made. The type was set direct from cases erected in the truck. The first edition came off the presses during the forenoon and others followed at a period of 15 lap intervals.

According to the publishers, this was the first occasion in the history of American newspaper printing that such an undertaking had been attemped. Thousands of copies of the Tribune's Speedway Extra were sold, as more than 80,000 persons were at the Speedway during the race.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN

Savage Quarrel Between the Editors Described—Bennett Denounces Noah—Beach Fined for Slandering Mrs. Bennett

THE animosity shown by Noah against Mr. Bennett was manifested through a long period of malignant attacks by the former, against which the latter cleverly retaliated. Noah had been elected Judge of the Court of Sessions in 1841, and the Herald thus sneeringly referred to it:

"The greatest joke is the new Judge in Israel—or Israelitish Judge in Christendom—M. M. Noah."

Atree fearlessly demanded that the order descinded, as it infringed on the liberty of the press, but admitted that "a few harmless remarks had been put into the mouth of Judge Noah" in the Herald's court report. A long and heated debate ensued in the Court, in which Atree eloquently defended his rights and severely criticized Noah's methods. Continuing, Atree said:

"Years ago by being presumed to possess the requisite amount of tact and talent, and by a proper and industrious exercise of the faculties which God has given me, I was raised to a seat in one of those Chairs from which his honor has so recently descended, to occupy a seat upon this Bench (laughter from the audience)—I mean the Editorial Chair! I am satisfied with my situation. I do my duty industriously. I serve my employer assiduously, and while I am satisfied in my own mind that I have paid proper attention to his orders, the unjust and informal orders of this or any other court.

"'Pass by me as the idle wind
Which I respect not.'"

Judge Noah stifled the applause which greeted this witty sally, and soon after the obnoxious order was rescinded.

About this time the Judge ran for trustee in the Synagogue, of the congregation of which he was a member and Mr. Bennett could not resist the opportunity to again hold him up to ridicule in this hilarious fashion:

"ANOTHER DEFEAT—NOAH'S WIG WRONG END FOREMOST AT THE SYNAGOGUE.—An election took place for trustees at the Synagogue in Crosby street on Tuesday. Noah was a candidate for one of the Board. One of his antagonists was Mr. Lazarus, a highly respectable Hebrew. Noah fixed on his wig and old breeches and tried to run into the office, but Mr. Lazarus left the judge far behind, the later having lost his wig and specs in the race. We congratulate the Crosby street people that they have not permitted an old political loafer to superintend the affairs of that holy place. Noah's piety lays in his breeches pockets."

Bennett's insults so vigorously worded rankled in the minds of both Noah and Beach, and no doubt led up to the scandalous attacks made by both these editors in 1842-3 upon Mrs. Bennett's reputation.

Another noted editor of that period, with whom Mr. Bennett frequently clasded, was James Brooks, of the Daily Express. On May 20, 1841, the Herald published a crude cartoon of Brooks, clad in feminine attire and labelled, "Biddy Brooks, Esq., reporter for the Female Moral Reform Society," followed by this item:

"The ladies of the Female Moral Reform Society held a meeting at which none were permited to enter who did not wear petticoats. Last year one of the ladies gave us a report of their proceedings, which appeared in the Herald. This stimulated the ambition of Booby Brooks, of the old maids newspaper, called the Express. Accordingly the Booby took off his pantaloons one evening last week, put on a chamber maid's petticoat, called himself 'Biddy Brooks' and walked into the ladies' society in great style. Biddy took notes of the sayings and made his report in yesterday's Express. The name of Booby Brooks is now changed to that of Biddy Brooks, without benefit of clergy. A special edict. Obey."

Hostile editors insisted that as Mr. Bennett had "written up" his wife in his own paper, she was a legitimate subject for public attack, and based probably on this theory, Noah, with clever ingenuity, made vague insinuations as to Mrs. Bennett's conduct while at Rockaway. Mr. Bennett, in a furious editorial, denounced Noah and defended his wife in the following words:

"Noah has the audacity, miserable rascal that he is, to reflect on Mrs. Bennett's conduct at Rockaway. Now it is well known to every lady and gentleman who were at the Marine Pavilion during last summer, that Mrs. James Gordon Bennett, during her stay there was one of the most reserved, most correct, the most lady-like, the most amiable of persons. * * * The conspiracy to destroy by falsehood my character and that of my family began in 1840. I was no sooner married than certain cliques of the 'pickled mackerel' aristocracy of New York, began to circulate falsehoods about the birth, parentage and character of my wife, who is in every way equal to any in this country."

Later on, in 1842, Noah again made certain insinuations relative to Mrs. Bennett, to which her husband made this passionate reply, coupled with a brief eulogy of his wife and her ancestry:

"This infamous old scoundrel had the meanness to attack my wife, whose character, birth, reputation, talent, devotion, honor and domestic affections are equal to any lady of this or any other country. It is true she is a native of Dublin, the descendant of a respectable and chivalrous Irish family—on the one side by the Crean-Lynch of the west of Ireland—and on the other by the Warrens of Dublin. All her relatives were persons of the best family and of the highest character. Her maternal grandfather was the well known Alderman Warren, who distinguished himself in the Irish troubles of 1798. Afterwards he was Lord Mayor of Dublin. Her father was a Catholic Liberal and a particular friend of O'Connell's, till the death of the former. Two of her uncles were of high rank in the British Army. Col. Nathaniel Warren, who served bravely and died in India, was knighted and had a statue erected to his brave memory in Madras. Another uncle, also a colonel in the army, is now in a high post in the Government at Jamaica.

"She came to this country four years ago with her excellent and amiable mother, who now lives at my house; and before her marriage, she lived the greater part of the time with a relative and cousin, at Dayton, Ohio, Mrs. Browning, the worthy and accomplished lady of Lieut. Browning of the U. S. Navy.

"This is the amiable and excellent young woman, now my wife, whose character has been assailed by that old scoundrel, M. M. Noah—that villain in human shape.

"I must beg pardon of my readers for introducing this subject, but the horrible conduct—the atrocious malice—the ineffable infamy of M. M. Noah and his miserable broken down coadjutors has compelled me to do so and to name names. And yet, this miserable, unprincipled old scoundrel has the impudence to talk of giving me advice—out of the sight of man, ye poor, bloated wretch! You ought to be hung on the same tree with your forefather, Barrabas, the robber."

Also Chooses the Linograph

AFTER a thorough and most careful investigation of all composing machines, Pittsburgh's new daily, the Daily Dispatch, has chosen the Linograph with which to equip their composing room.

This decision was reached only after Mr. George P. Grise, President of the Dispatch Publishing Company had made a trip to New York to see all models of type-setting machines at the A. N. P. A. Convention. As a result, the initial order of Linographs will include a battery of six of the multiple magazine Model 3's and one of the new All Purpose Model 12's.

SELLING ECONOMICS COURSE TO PUBLIC INCREASED BUSINESS 600 PER CENT

Building and Loan Association's Assets Rose from $2,700,000 to $18,000,000 Since 1920, After Newspaper Campaign of Education

By HAMMOND EDWARD FRANKLIN

PERHAPS there is a "big idea," which, if uncovered and developed carefully, then sold to your public through advertising might increase your sales more in the next few years than in many past years of business history.

WM. L. VAN SICKLE

Such ideas are elusive. Sometimes they come after months and years of painstaking work. Again, the "happy thought" which creates a big jump in sales comes in a sudden flash. Once you have the idea, you have the problem of putting it to work to produce a net profit.

The president and general manager of the Columbian Building & Loan Company, Columbus, Ohio, had a baffling problem.

He solved it by a "happy thought" put into action by powerful, never-stopping newspaper advertising. The results have been sensational.

In only three and one-half years this building and loan company's business has shown an increase of over 600 per cent!

This has been done in spite of almost overwhelming obstacles and without any precedents to guide. The plan which has ben used so successfully can be used almost anywhere there is a building and loan association. Let any skeptic on the subject of the value of newspaper space read how this company obtained new business totaling over $15,000,000 in rapid-fire time, and did it through the newspapers!

On July 1, 1920, when the new policy was put into effect, the building and loan company had assets of $2,692,752.20. Today the assets are above $18,000,000. This shows that even the long-established concern can step out of a rut and sometimes make strides which surprise itself, when its heads hit upon the right basic plan of operation which will appeal most to the public and which it has "nerve" enough to advertise along its own lines.

You will remember the great changes and perplexing, often discouraging, problems the entrance of America into the war brought to all men in business.

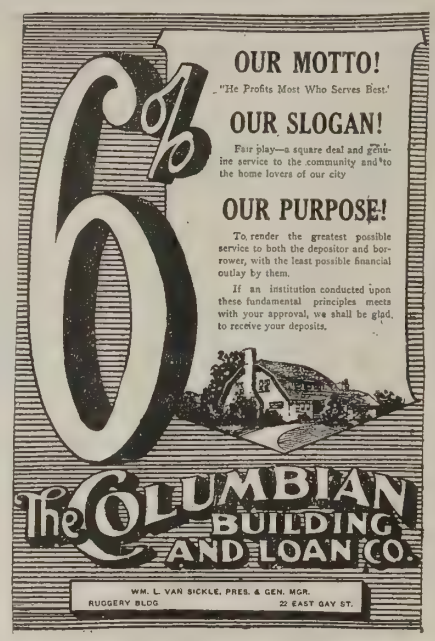
You can appreciate, therefore, what this meant to building and loan associations. People invested in government bonds, and such associations, far from attracting funds, were being subjected to heavy withdrawals. Homes and other buildings are as necessary during war as in peace, but of course the normal functioning of these associations in lending money to build homes was greatly checked and in many cases altogether stopped.

Take Columbus, Ohio, for instance. It is estimated that fully 90 per cent of the home builders there depend upon the building and loan companies to finance their homes.

"Like many other building and loan executives, I was passing many restless nights wondering what could be done for our institution," William L. Van Sickle, president and general manager of the Columbian Building & Loan Company, said. "It was one of those sleepless nights after midnight that the idea of what we later termed our 'flexible plan' came to me as an inspiration.

"Why should any financial institution arbitrarily determine a fixed price for money regardless of supply and demand? Why shouldn't the price of money (like the price of any other commodity) be determined by the good old economic law of supply and demand itself? That was the 'happy thought' which suggested our new plan of operation.

"Under the customary plan of conducting their business, building and loan companies of Columbus received their depositors' money at 5 per cent and tied it up in long time mortgage loans at 6 per cent payable in monthly instalments of one dollar per $100 per month. They, therefore, could not pay more than 5 per cent on deposits, no matter how much money might be worth in the market. During the war, many associations advanced the interest rate on mortgages without increasing the interest on deposits.



"We realized the unfairness and real danger of continuing to conduct our business on that basis, and inaugurated the 'flexible plan,' which consists of inserting in our mortgage notes a clause authorizing our directors to vary the rate of interest thereon as financial conditions and the current rate of interest may justify, based on sound economic law. That's the gist of our 'big idea,' which has certainly proven a wise move, even though one which broke our precedents.

"After investigating carefully, we found that the United States was short 700,000 homes at the time and that between 300,000 and 400,000 homes per year would have to be built just to take care of the expanding population and replace those destroyed by fire. We also found that, because of restricted immigration and certain other causes, building mechanics available were from 10 to 20 per cent shorter than ten years previous.

"The conclusion was plain. Until the shortage of homes was supplied, there would be an abnormal demand for money for home building and, as long as this continued, money on loans would be worth 7 per cent. Thus we not only would be in a position but would be compelled to pay 6 per cent on deposits in order to obtain sufficient funds to supply the demand."

The "flexible plan" was put into effect, with a continuation of the same safeguards as to handling and lending the money as always previously used. Each applicant for a loan had to fill out a blank, containing about 30 questions, which give the officers a basis on which to work. Then they investigated the character of each applicant and his ability to pay, two all-important factors.

After having found the moral risk satisfactory, the appraisers next visit the property. The judgment of one appraiser is not depended upon; the certificate of three appraisers is required. The value of the property has to be double the loan granted. After this work by the appraisers, the executive committee of the institution considers the loan, reviews the report on the applicant and examines the valuation on the property. If all is satisfactory, either the loan is made in the amount requested or the applicant is told what amount he can secure as a loan on the property.

Many applications are rejected and few applicants are accorded the full amount asked.

Because convinced that the purpose of a building and loan institution is to aid in the acquirement of homes, the Columbian Building & Loan Company makes few straight mortgages and much prefers the monthly payment plan. As peak prices now prevail on real estate and there is likely to be a decline, this method also is considered wise, for, as the security declines, the amount of the mortgage is reduced accordingly. The company has demonstrated it can pay legitimate expenses and place a handsome sum in the reserve fund each year and has placed there more than the law requires. During its 33 years of experience, including the flood of 1913, total losses have amounted to less than $12,000.

"Since putting this plan into effect July 1, 1920, it is interesting to note we have not had a single loss nor had to foreclose a single mortgage, and have not taken a penny from our reserve fund," Mr. Van Sickle commented. "When money is no longer worth 6 per cent, we shall reduce the rate of interest on deposits to 5½ per cent. We shall then be just as fair to our borrowers as we have been to our depositors, and shall reduce the rate of interest on all loans, both old and new, to 6½ per cent."

It was not enough to originate such a plan.

The next step was to convince the public of its desirability and soundness. Naturally, the public is sensitive and suspicious when the idea concerned pertains to finances.

It was necessary to show the sound economy of the plan, to get the public to appreciate its fairness to all concerned, to show just how it operated, and to win

RELATING TO THE EAR

If you have advertised in Brooklyn without generous success perhaps you may not have used the STANDARD UNION.

Why not do as the judge did who had before him a deaf man who had been arrested for driving an automobile.

"I'll give you another hearing," said the judge.

And the man was delighted.

If you will give Brooklyn another hearing we'll be delighted—and so will you.

Cincinnatus is a Great Traveler

Living well at home, the people of Cincinnati maintain this standard of living when away from home. Wardrobe trunks, traveling bags, cameras, binoculars, golf equipment, fishing tackle, vacuum bottles and lunch kits not to mention traveling apparel for both sexes, find a ready sale among them—when properly brought to their attention.

There is probably no community of like size in which there is greater interest in tourist information—the routes and accommodations of railroad and steamship lines, the attractions of hotels and the like. Certainly none has both the interest and the means to gratify it in more liberal degree.

If you have merchandise or services calculated to appeal to the traveling public, to those who go de Luxe and to those who vacation via Flivver, to the "personally conducted" party or to the "habitual globe trotter," to camper or to hiker, to "college men" or to "finishing school misses," the Times-Star will deliver your message most acceptably.

The proof of this claim is of course statistical—cold, uncompromising figures of circulation, lineage data and the cumulative evidence of sixteen consecutive years undisputed leadership in the field of Cincinnati Newspaperdom. Yours for the asking. Write for it.

to this Great Market of 4,500,000 people served by one trading center

SPREADING out in every direction from St. Louis, its one big trading center, is a great new commonwealth of more than 4,500,000 people, known as the 49th State.

It is a circle—radius 150 miles. A circle of opportunity for manufacturers and advertisers seeking greater sales of established products—distribution and demand for new ones—or a new market for products now successfully sold elsewhere.

A Big Responsive Market Concentrated Around One Metropolis

There are 1,000,000 dwellings—1,100,000 families—more than 4,500,000 people to supply. Enormous daily needs!

Compared with the large cities of the country the 49th State ranks third in value of purchases—exceeding the combined total of Cleveland, Washington, Kansas City, Indianapolis and Denver! The wealth is based on a wider variety of natural resources and industry than any other state can show. The area is the heart of the rich Mississippi Valley. The natural central outlet for practically 70% of the country's agricultural products—75% of the lumber and forestry products—60% of the minerals—and 70% of the petroleum.

A veritable maze of railroads and highways makes every section easily and quickly accessible. Makes possible the efficient routing of salesmen. And enables the people from every section to come to St. Louis to shop.

Records show that every month more than 1,000,000 people come to St. Louis from out of town. During an ordinary month the average sale to out-of-town shoppers taking advantage of the Associated Retailers' railroad refund plan was $101.99! Why not sell your merchandise to these valuable customers?

Here is tremendous buying power—a naturally concentrated market—reached by the Globe-Democrat—Largest Daily in the 49th State. No other St. Louis paper even claims to cover the area.

The Globe-Democrat—because of its thorough coverage—gives national advertisers an unusual opportunity to localize their national advertising in the 49th State—and at a milline rate lower than that of the average metropolitan newspaper.

Daily and Sunday the Globe-Democrat Reaches the Largest Number of Families in the 49th State

The Daily circulation of the Globe-Democrat in the 49th State outside of St. Louis is more than three times that of the first evening paper!

The Sunday circulation of the Globe-Democrat in the 49th State outside of St. Louis is greater than that of the other Sunday newspaper!

75.9% of the total Sunday circulation of the Globe-Democrat is concentrated in the 49th State, including St. Louis!

That the Globe-Democrat is read, both Daily and Sunday by the families that represent the real purchasing power of the 49th State is shown by the results of an investigation recently made among the charge customers of one of the largest St. Louis department stores.

79% of those living in the 49th State, including St. Louis, read the Daily Globe-Democrat. Only 14% additional coverage is obtained by using the first evening paper in addition to the Daily Globe-Democrat.

76% of those living in the 49th State, including St. Louis, read the Sunday Globe-Democrat. Only 20% additional coverage is obtained by using the other St. Louis Sunday paper in addition to the Sunday Globe-Democrat.

The Dominant Newspaper in Dealer Influence!

Dotting the 49th State are 374 thriving towns of more than 1000 population. Progressive communities where many of the buying habits of the people have been shaped by advertising in the Globe-Democrat. These people buy from progressive local dealers—from more than 45,000 in the 49th State outside of St. Louis.

The replies to a questionnaire recently sent to dealers in the 49th State show that 92.2% read the Globe-Democrat — and 88.2% state that Globe-Democrat advertising helps them to sell goods.

NATION WARNED AGAINST MENACE OF FOREIGN LANGUAGE PRESS

By STANLEY CLAGUE
Managing Director, Audit Bureau of Circulations

THE thought has been running through my mind for several months since certain confidential information has been imparted to me by high officers in the Intelligence Division of the Government that every citizen of the United States, but more particularly every publisher, should repeat daily and hourly those three significant words "Lest we forget"—"Lest we forget."

Recently the Senate of the United States, some say wisely, some say unwisely, decided to award compensation to those of our boys who devoted their time and strength in the defense of our Nation from an attack of a foreign enemy.

Great as that danger was to the United States in the closing years of the second decade of the twentieth century, I believe the danger to our national life in the immediate years to come is greater than we at present realize. The enemies from without in the history of the United States always have and always will be beaten. But there are two elements in our country, both equally threatening.

The first source of danger is a noisy minority of men and women, who under the guise of various so-called "peace societies" and "peace schools" seek to nullify all that has been accomplished in building up our nation to defend itself and who would make a mockery of the tribute which Congress has paid to the young veterans of the late war.

The only way in which these individuals can accomplish their purpose is through the free publicity which you publishers give to their activities. In the city of Evanston in which I live, 38 of these individuals entered an Epworth League meeting and through the power of some super-publicity agent secured notoriety which spread throughout the nation. To the same city there has recently returned a man who has done more than any one single individual in recent years to bring back peace and good will among the jealous nations of the world, and yet I venture the opinion that these 38 unbaked youths have commanded more space on the front pages of our daily newspapers than has the achievements of General Charles G. Dawes.

We have in this country 1,200 papers printed in foreign languages. If the American people could read what is printed in many of these publications—in Russian, Syrian, Arabic, Italian and 30 other languages—it would make their blood run cold. Every week—every month—millions of papers, periodicals and hand-bills are being distributed spreading communistic and other doctrines, the avowed editorial policy being to pull down the American flag, abolish American laws and destroy American institutions. Every issue of these papers, periodicals and hand-bills seeks to add to the germs of the cancerous growth which endangers the welfare of our country.

On the other hand, there exists a small, but growing element in the foreign language press which is steadily pressing on towards the assimilation of those of foreign birth who desire to become true American citizens.

My closing appeal is that this element should not only be encouraged by the advertisers of the country, thereby forcing out of the foreign language field the undesirable element, but should also be encouraged by papers printed in our national language to the end that eventually there shall be one press and one people—both American in the deepest and sincerest sense of all that the word "American" means.

And to this end I feel sure I am speaking for you when I pledge the Audit Bureau of Circulations to give its unswerving support to the attainment of American ideals, untainted by cancerous growth from within, so that we may stand united and unafraid to meet any possible danger that may confront us in the future from any land across any sea.

By MAURICE KETTEN

Possessed of Rare Native Humor

IN writing or speaking of Maurice Ketten, it is necessary to make allowance for one quality which renders him almost unique among the artists of to-day who specialize in the raising of laughter. This quality is a true sense of humor. In Mr. Ketten it has been strong enough to survive a course in the Beaux Arts, in Paris, and to come unscathed through residences in Quincy, Ill., Denver, Col., Westport, Conn., and New York, N. Y. The testing process scarcely could go to further extremes, unless, indeed, our drawing friend were to try for a time the comic atmosphere of Washington, D. C., in which jokes have become matters of such ordinary growth and frequency that they sit in both houses of Congress.

MAURICE KETTEN

Such a humorous sense as Mr. Ketten possesses cannot be acquired. It has to be native. And this makes curious the fact that he began his career in art with palette, brushes, oils and a serious purpose. He was thrown off the original track of his ambition when a Paris editor induced him to draw cartoons for a daily paper in the French capital. This sort of employment turned his thoughts to comics, and when he got ready to migrate to this land of the former free, his artistic course was all charted in the direction of the "Can You Beat It?" line, and the "Such Is Life," and "The Day of Rest," way station which he has marked with high lights of jesting and satire on the pages of The Evening World and its syndicated contemporaries.

Mr. Ketten's earlier tendencies in the turning out of comics was to say it in curves. He retains still a sufficient deftness in that particular to afford us an occasional spring girl, winter girl, Easter girl, or just girlie-girl, rich in sweeping graces.

Thirty-Seven Steps Forward!

During the half-year just ended we have made the biggest advance in the history of our organization.

Thirty-seven newspapers have adopted the National Standard of Classified Advertising since January first. They are scattered over fourteen states and Canada. Their circulations range from 3,478 to 121,868.

We believe that the reason for our winning new clients more rapidly than ever before is that the classified advertising principles for which we have been pioneering in the past are today beginning to take a sure hold on the American newspaper consciousness.

We are ready to cooperate with newspapers of any size in building their successful futures on the cornerstone of classified advertising.

The following newspapers have inaugurated service connections with us since January 1st, 1924:

"THE AUTOPLATE is the first real advance we have had in newspaper machinery since the quadruple press and its multiples came into use. It is a genuine addition to the labor and time-saving appliances so essential to the progress of a modern newspaper.

"The problem of producing stereo plates rapidly enough to give press value to our plant has been a great problem. We often got no more than twenty minutes' running out of the last press to start. The office was piling up printing presses in a desperate and expensive effort to keep up with the growing demands of size and circulation, but with little result.

"All progress stopped at the door of the stereo-room. Vast and complicated presses with crews of fourteen men each were compelled to stand idle by the hour as the night went on, waiting for plates to trickle down through the slow hand boxes, while during the heated term overworked men dropped beside the casting boxes and had to be carried to the hospital.

"It used to take fifty minutes, and often an hour, to do all the work by hand.

"On our evening runs we start presses now so rapidly as to almost make it seem like an instantaneous jump, and we have decreased our running time one hour and ten minutes, which means just that much more selling time for an afternoon paper.

"On our Morning and Sunday runs the saving in press time averages over $200 per week, to say nothing of the advantages of late closing in the composing-room and a more certain product for the mails.

WISE FOOLS

WONDERFUL man!
Mysterious man!
Sees the same sun rise over the Atlantic and set over the Pacific by driving his body, with gas and a wing, through space at 150 miles an hour.

Fights with his fists in Madison Square Garden over politics and religion.

Refuses to support "controversial" newspapers or magazines.

Spends millions to see a prize fight.

Sends photographs by wire.

Is most popularly interested in leg pictures and comics.

Has not solved the problem of the city slum.

Enjoys the radio and understands its principle.

Hopes his son will not be "visionary" or "dreamer."

Develops in the United States sufficient farm land and agricultural machinery to supply half the world with creature necessities.

Cannot devise a world credit system, though millions overseas cry for the wheat and corn which bankrupt farmers burn for fuel.

Invents motion pictures.

Discovers the secrets of wealth and supplies the masses with means of comfort unknown to kings of previous generations.

Permits millions of his brothers to suffer or desperately struggle for a living.

Reverences health and spends lavishly for hospitals and the science of medicine.

Sleeps with windows shut and loses teeth in thirties for want of brushing.

Reverences law and order.

Dodges taxes and patronizes bootleggers.

Invents gas bombs which, when dropped from planes, will annihilate populations of cities.

Can find no universally acceptable plan for settling international disputes by processes of reason.

Sings of the beauty of the forest and believes in conservation of natural resources.

Allows two-thirds of all timber to be destroyed by fire or in wasteful cutting.

Accepts oil as automotive fuel.

Allows 25 per cent of the value of oil to evaporate in storage and leaves from 25 to 85 per cent of oil in the ground, due to reckless drilling.

Writes classic literature and economically prints it with art rivaling that of monastery monks.

Buys Sloppy Stories to read.

Believes in God.

Worships mammon.

Wonderful, strange man!

Do not attempt to resist popular scientific mechanical trends, like radio, pictures by wire, photographs in natural colors, new means of rapid transportation, or better, faster printing. The American people look to the newspapers for perfection, and on the side of enterprise lies prosperity.

THE POSTAL "LEAK"

A member of the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association calculated his loss and found that in 1918 the cost of distributing 17,000 copies of his paper outside of the city of publication cost less than $12,000 annually, for second-class postage and express, whereas in 1923 he distributed 11,000 copies at a cost of $21,000, for the same service.

The cost of sending the average copy of a newspaper per year by second-class postage has jumped from 70 cents to $1.76.

Investigate this "leak" and press for your right! Large newspapers of great cities may temporize with this overcharge, but it is a desperate hardship upon the smaller papers in out-lying sections of the country.

PROVERBS

CHAPTER XXIII. 23

Buy the truth and sell it not; also wisdom, and instruction and understanding.

SPIRIT OF THE MID-WEST

MONMOUTH, Illinois, has a population of 8,500, and supports two daily newspapers, both published evenings and each with approximately 3,000 circulation. Monmouth is a fine little American community with a spirit of live-and-let-live and a lively interest in the best things that life anywhere affords.

Just how modern this typical mid-west town is in its ideas and practises was shown last week when the elements suddenly shuffled the usually well-ordered routine.

The first mishap occurred when fire at night destroyed the press room of the Daily Atlas, causing $35,000 damage. The Daily Review offered its plant to the Daily Atlas in order that no reader of that newspaper might miss an issue. The offer was accepted by A. W. Barnes, Atlas publisher, and immediately after the Daily Review was run through the press the plates of the Atlas were mounted for the usual run.

The following day a wind storm, accompanied by lightning, interrupted wire communication to the neighboring town of Macomb, and the editor of the Monmouth Daily Atlas "filled in" with the A. P. report the news service that had been cut off from the Macomb By-Stander.

This little, neighborly act completed that day's effort, but on Saturday night a gale of tornado intensity struck the community and the Daily Review's supply of gas and electric power was cut off. Nothing daunting, the editor rallied a force of printers who knew how to set type by hand and by the old-fashioned, tedious methods the news of the great storm and the Democratic National Convention and the usual run of important local was composed. The perfecting press was useless, so the editor rigged a gasoline engine to a flat-bed press.

But the editor of the Daily Review could not print a second issue by these slow means for his stricken neighbor, the Atlas, so they put the title lines of both papers at the top of the hand-set first page and went to press with a combination newspaper. The news and mechanical forces of both papers worked as one staff. The combination paper was handled by the respective circulation departments in the usual manner. It was a good looking newspaper, carrying a smashing banner line on the storm, and the story was well-written.

The same storm interrupted the usual telegraph service and we notice that the combined Daily Review and Atlas gave their readers a very satisfactory account of the big doings at Madison Square Garden, "by radio from SKD, St. Louis."

To cap the climax of this "small city press romance" we find on the first page of the combination newspaper a story of how the "representatives of both Monmouth newspapers" obtained an airplane and toured the county in order to observe storm damage. The reporters came back with a splendid "bird's eye" account of high waters, unroofed farm houses, uprooted trees, washed out bridges and such damage.

The whole performance, both for modern, practical enterprise and for decency in business competition, strikes us as a classic example of the spirit of a new day and better times.

There are a few geniuses in the advertising business the value of whose work is only exceeded by those who base their advertising salesmanship upon a thorough understanding of merchandising.

FAKE ADVERTISING

NO sensible person regards as "sacrifice" conduct which conserves the rules of honor or decency. No newspaper envies prosperity bought by an abandonment of the rules of honorable journalism. It is interesting, however, to speculate on the financial forfeits involved in the refusal to print advertising of low caste, or of doubtful commodities.

The general public may only vaguely understand that the newspapers of the United States, by strict censorship of their advertising columns, turn away from their counting rooms many millions of dollars annually. The fake patent medicine, the raw stock promotion, the deceptive "bargain" lures of 47 kinds of swindlers do not show in the decent newspapers of the United States, but this generation does not know that it was the newspaper, rather than any outside source, that voluntarily cleaned up this field of fraud and impudent exploitation of the ignorant, "easy" public.

It is respectfully suggested that newspapers might very well remind their readers of the circumstances by means of which newspaper advertising has become worthy of belief, through the voluntary censorship of newspaper editors and managers.

This might be done in positive terms by warning investors caught by forms of advertising less scrupulous than newspapers. Here are a dozen rules recently issued by the United States Government Savings System which, if given currency in the press, might restrain untold losses through bad investments:

"TWELVE DANGER SIGNS"

"1. Mining Stock. The best looking mine in the world may prove a 'white elephant.' Mining is a very expensive undertaking and the risks are usually great. There is a saying that a mine 'is a hole where fools dump their money.' There are many good mining investments, of course, but this branch of the investment market is generally not for those who work for and depend upon a salary.

"2. Oil Stock. Drilling for oil is costly. The hazards are great. Oil investments are speculative and in a class with mining investments.

"3. In the wake of every important discovery or invention there comes a host of schemes—'airplanes,' 'radio,' 'wireless.' The promoters of these may have not only the best of intentions, but frequently their enthusiasm is about all they have to sell. Look before you leap.

"4. Investments in 'real estate' situated in some distant place are sometimes as dangerous as mining stock. Know what you are buying before you invest.

"5. 'Land development' schemes frequently do not pan out. At best it is a long time before any money comes in from sales. Investment in 'new companies' that are going to 'sell by mail' should be generally avoided.

"6. Patent rights and processes distribution. It is rarely the patentee who makes the money.

"7. 'New Manufacturing Methods' should always be closely checked and investigated.

"8. An investment requiring a quick decision is often a fake.

"9. 'Special inducements' in cash discounts or stock bonuses urging you to be one of the first to invest are suspicious symptoms.

"10. 'Tips' alleged to land you 'on the ground floor' are rarely to be taken.

"11. 'Playing the stock market on margin' and all other forms of speculation are decidedly not for the small investor. Beware of the 'bucket shop.' If you buy stocks outright for investment do so through a member of a legitimate exchange.

"12. Stock in 'mail order companies' being organized with promises based on what others have done rarely turn out well."

HOUSE TO HOUSE CANVASS WITH SMALL PREMIUM GOOD IN THE COUNTRY

By GEORGE ERB, JR.,
Buffalo News

CANVASSING on the Buffalo News has all been done upon the merits of our paper. The objection to this form of canvass is that it brings in a lot of new business that has little or no permanent value. On a proposition of this sort it is impossible to sign the new reader up for any designated time, and the best the solicitor can do is to urge that they try your paper for a while.

This is easily understandable, for not having signed any contract the subscriber knows they have the option of discontinuing at any time.

Failure of this form of canvass to work out may be attributable to the changed conditions today in the country. The small-town daily, much stronger and a keener competitor than that of ten years ago, has a greater influence among its local readers and gives them everything they need in the way of local and telegraph news, so that the larger out-of-town paper must give the prospective new reader an inducement of some kind in addition to a lot of exclusive features.

I believe that a well selected list of prizes to boys, making it an incentive for them to canvass their routes for new readers, will get you more permanent business than solicitors working only on the merits of your paper. People feel bound by their promise to the boy whom they are generally well acquainted with to continue their subscription for the stipulated time, giving your publication a better opportunity to become a regular fixture in the home.

Some papers deem it expedient to have their solicitor take the carrier boy and canvass only the homes of those taking the competing paper, but I do not believe this method provides the maximum amount of new business available for it overlooks the people not taking any paper, among whom are found the greater number of new reader prospects.

While we have never used premiums nor do we favor their use, there may be occasions when they are advisable.

From my experience I believe that a straight house-to-house canvass with a highly trained force of solicitors using some small article in daily use in the home as a special inducement should prove the best method.

This Scheme Worked

When Richard Harding Davis was trying to attach himself to the staff of a New York newspaper he tried a scheme that worked. On fine stationery he wrote to the managing editor of a newspaper, signing the name of a pseudo secretary. It said: "Mr. Richard Harding Davis will call on you at three Thursday afternoon to discuss a matter of great importance." Davis was immediately ushered in. At first the managing editor was piqued but Davis got the job.

The Staggering Cost of Government

By WILLIAM P. HELM, Jr.

American government has cost one hundred billion dollars in the past eight years.

After having spent this stupendous sum (nearly one-third of our present national wealth) we are still indulging in the greatest spending spree of any nation in the history of the world.

Figured from the taxpayer's viewpoint, this is an average of almost $5,000 from the head of each family in the United States.

The federal government is now spending four times as much money every year for ordinary expenses as it spent before the World War.

States, counties and cities are spending three times as much annually as they spent during the pre-war period.

William P. Helm, Jr., author of "The Truth About Taxes," is writing a series of twenty articles disclosing these and other startling facts and figures. These articles show how much each form of government is taking from the people and how the money is being spent.

The summary and analysis of these facts is sensational. The material is prepared with a completeness not heretofore attempted, and in clear, simple, dramatic style.

The first release of this series, which will run three times a week, is on Monday, July 14. A limited amount of territory is still open.

GOTTHART'S "MORGUE" CALLED BEST NEWSPAPER LIBRARY IN COUNTRY

They Told Chicago Man He Was "Wasting His Time" When He Began Cross Referencing News Items 18 Years Ago—Now Ask His Aid

WHEN one wanders through the elaborate "morgues" or reference libraries of newspapers throughout the country and see how easily it can be learned what John Smith did in 1910 to get his name in the newspaper, he is apt to wonder how they used to get along in the past without these ready aids.

It was memory, more than anything else, that tided them over, according to Charles J. Gotthart, one of the best-known "morgue keepers" in Chicago and probably in the United States.

Back about 18 years ago, Gotthart, then a reporter for the Chicago Tribune, disregarding the effort of his associates who tried to persuade him he was "wasting his time," began to devote his spare moments to clipping virtually all items appearing in Chicago newspapers and filing them under an elaborate cross-reference system.

This was in those days before newspapers realized the advantages of "morgues" as they do today—the days when reporters obtained the background for stories either from their own memories or from veteran members of the staff. But too often was memory proved fallible, and so Gotthart began to compile something far more tangible and dependable.

Now he has what he declares to be the "best newspaper reference library in America," including a record of "everything worth while published in the Chicago dailies since 1906."

"For 10 years I was a 'big stick' or 'backstop' on the Tribune, handling dangerous stories and having charge of campaigns against crooks," Mr. Gotthart said. "Frequently in gathering evidence for defending a libel suit, for instance, I spent a lot of time and effort in running down something which I finally learned had been printed in the Tribune.

"It was in this manner that I came to realize that the newspaper 'morgue' of that day was inadequate. Almost nothing was filed at that time except the big, important stories. They were of little use, because the principal facts of the big stories stuck in the minds of the members of the staff so definitely that it seldom was necessary to verify them. I became aware of the need for a 'morgue,' with every name in every story cross-referenced—a 'morgue' that would be good for newspaper and commercial purposes."

While working full time on the Tribune, Gotthart worked nights on his "morgue." In November, 1916, he obtained his release from his contract with the Tribune. For 3 years then he conducted a newspaper-reference bureau. At the end of this period he leased his "morgue" to the Chicago Evening Post, under an arrangement providing that he should have charge of the Post's reference room.

"I shall take things easy," he says. "I'm not going to do any work for a while, except to write an occasional feature story. And later, when my health permits, I shall go back on the street as a reporter and give these young fellows something to shoot at."

Since 1916, Gotthart has supplied a wide variety of information from his files for newspapers, law firms and some of the biggest commercial corporations of Chicago.

"That 'morgue' would have been a mint for Mr. Gotthart if he had sold his information more freely," a friend of this veteran said. "I am sure that he has rejected more business than he has accepted. He will not furnish 'dope' to anyone until he is convinced that the applicant is trustworthy and reliable and will not use the information wrongfully."

6,000 Replies

(From The Advertisers' Weekly, June 21, 1924)

On June 10, I inserted a full page advertisement in The New York Times asking the New York public whether they wanted a new, clean and purposeful newspaper like the Globe, before its sale and destruction.

Up to June 18, I received over 6,000 replies, many of which were amazingly impressive letters.

In advance of the publication of the advertisement, one of the greatest advertising experts in the country told me that if I received 600 replies the advertisement would have done its work, and that if I received 1000 it would indicate a landslide.

To get ten times 600 replies, when it is conceded that only about one person in ten who intends to reply does so, proves beyond discussion that the New York Times is the wonderful newspaper I have gone on record as saying that it is.

Publisher Says Next Papers Will Be in Detroit and Seattle

"My next papers will be established in Seattle and Detroit," declared Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr., Pacific Coast publisher, to a gathering of Northwest editors recently at the Seattle Press Club, when he related his experiences in starting his tabloid morning paper in Los Angeles.

"These two papers will be 100 per cent union because that is the best business policy for a publisher. Union printers are efficient printers. Men with the skill and brains are found in the typographical, stereotypers, mailers and pressmen's union.

"I intend to continue dealing with the printing trades unions on every daily of the chain of 30 which I intend to operate in the United States," declared Vanderbilt.

"WHEN A FELLER NEEDS A FRIEND" AND GETS ONE

Pathetic Cartoon Appeal by Briggs

MANY newspaper editors in this country regard as a legitimate function of journalism some definite contribution to the welfare of the submerged minority of every city. One of the most effective newspaper welfare enterprises is the "Fresh Air Fund." There are a dozen or more newspapers conducting such funds and administrating farms or seashore resorts in behalf of women and children of city slums who otherwise would have no taste of country or salt air breeze in the hot summer months.

One such newspaper is the Herald Tribune of New York. In 1877 the New York Tribune originated the system of collecting, through the columns of the newspaper, sufficient money to send to the country, for brief vacations, deserving women and children. In that year, the paper collected $187.62 and provided for vacations for 60 children. Last year the same newspaper collected and dispensed $107,325.51 in behalf of 14,144 poor women and children of the great metropolis.

A girl was found fainting in an East Side library. An ambulance physician found she was starving. The "Fresh Air Fund" of the Tribune, sent her to the country where her body was nourished into health and her mind was given courage for a fresh start in the battle of life.

A mother, who needed a major operation, but could not enter a hospital while leaving a little red-haired daughter at home, found her problem suddenly solved by the magic of the "Fresh Air Fund" which the took the child away for six weeks so mother could be well again.

The laborer father of five small children was confronted by black perplexity when his wife suddenly died. The Herald Tribune "Fresh Air Fund" took his children into the country until he could arrange for their future.

In such manner this fund untangles the snarled skeins of poverty in hundreds and thousands of New York tenements every year. The newspaper gives to children of the tenements a two weeks' country vacation free, without question as to color, creed or race. It operates with the welfare workers of hospitals, settlements, schools, clinics, dispensaries, nurseries and churches throughout greater New York.

The Herald Tribune is planning this year to give at least 16,000 lads and lasses a happy summer playtime.

A bond of $1,000 to idemnify the city for any damage which might be incurred through erection of the boards is also required of all owners.

PITTSBURGH DISPATCH'S PLANS

President Grise Says 16-Page Daily Will Be Produced in August

PITTSBURGH, July 1.—George P. Grise, president of the Pittsburgh Dispatch, new daily which is scheduled to begin publication in August, this week said:

"The daily will be 16 pages, 8 columns, and will carry international News Service, Cosmopolitan Service, and a special sport wire. All equipment has been contracted for, including 12 Linographs and a Duplex press. Installation will begin soon.

"The company has leased with option to buy the 4-story Speer Building, 118 Sixth street, in the lower side of the downtown district. This building now houses the offices of the promoters. Capitalization of the daily is $1,500,000.

"Leonard Faulkner, formerly of the New York Herald, will be managing editor of the Dispatch. A complete staff for both editorial and business departments has been obtained. Individual names will not be announced until a later date. Twenty-two reporters will be employed."

Officers of the Dispatch Company are: George P. Grise, Avalanon, Pa., president; Anna Core Grise, vice-president; A. M. Winner, secretary; Philip Anthers, treasurer; John A. Hooper, advertising manager; R. F. Erhler and J. C. Cochran, in charge of circulation.

HARRISBURG, Pa., June 30.—At a hearing in the Dauphin County Court on Monday, the Daily Dispatch Publishing Co., of Pittsburgh, argued its appeal against a decision of the State Securities Bureau, refusing to register it under the Securities Act with permission to sell stock.

The Bureau had refused the company permission to sell stock and dissipate 55 percent of the income from such sale and circulation subscriptions.

The Commonwealth alleged that Samuel Drich, King Kleagle of the Ku Klux Klan in Pennsylvania, had contracted to sell stock, retaining 25 percent as commission. The Commonwealth alleged that Drich had spread the word that the paper was to be the official Pennsylvania Klan organ and urged the purchase of stock at Klan meetings. George P. Grize, president of the Dispatch Company, emphatically denied that the paper was to be a Klan organ, but admitted he had attended Klan gatherings and urged the purchase of his company's stock.

The testimony showed that some time this year Drich and Company terminated the contract, and under date of January 30, a letter was sent to Klansmen telling them that the Klan had been deprived of active participation and that the Klan could no longer recommend the purchase of the stock.

The latest words from the management is that the paper will start in the middle of August.

NEW $250,000 HOME FOR TULSA TRIBUNE

Structure of Six Stories Will Have Frontage of 140 Feet and Be 60 Feet Deep—Will Have Offices for Rent

The Tulsa (Okla.) Tribune has started work on a new building, which, when completed, will be 6 stories high.

Four stories are to be erected at the present time. The building will have a frontage of 140 feet and will be 60 feet deep. It will cost approximately $250,000.

The Tribune plant of today will stand until the east half of the new building has been erected, four months from now. When the large amount of machinery in the present structure has been moved into the new side the old building will be torn down and the new building completed to the fifth floor, probably by April 1, 1925.

The front opposite the first and mezzanine floors will be faced with Indiana Bedford buff limestone and that opposite the second, third, fourth and fifth floors of Tulsa made, matt faced brick. The sixth floor front will be of terra cotta.

In the basement there will be a cooling system which will wash air and blow it throughout the building. In the winter the building will be heated by steam heat. Oil will be used for fuel.

The Tribune will occupy all of the first and second and half of the fourth floors. In the remainder of the building there will be 63 office rooms for rent.

The offices of the publisher and the assistant editors will be on the fourth floor, east half. There will be a large assembly room on this floor, too.

The west half of the fourth floor and all of the fifth floor will be divided into offices for rent.

The Tribune is under the direction of: Richard Lloyd-Jones, editor and publisher; William B. Dimon, general manager; Victor Barnett, managing editor, and Cranford Wheeler, associate editor.

Mr. Ridout will continue his news-service from the British field with the wider aspects of newspaper and advertising interests to draw upon, now that he has concluded the Convention work to which he set his hand.)

Last Moment Notes

These are the last notes it is possible to give before our American delegates set foot upon the Republic and Lancastria enroute to the first International Advertising Convention at Wembley. Incidentally, they are the last notes to appear beneath this heading for with the sailing of those delegates the purpose for which the news feature was originally planned is fulfilled. The writer thanks the numerous correspondents in America and in Europe who have made his work one of pleasure by their kindly comments. 'Nuff sed.

For the first attempt our people on this side are feeling mighty proud of what they've done. Everything's ready, the stage is being set and you boys on the big liners would be well advised to get to bed early the last two nights on board. You'll need that sleep and you'll never regain it once you land in Britain.

Remember you'll probably find yourself fighting an irresistible impluse to sleep for the first few days in Britain. That's climatic. But your British hosts won't let you sleep, so get it while you can.

A litle hint. Don't speak of England or Englishmen if you can avoid it. This makes Scotsmen mad and Irishmen madder. Say "Britain" or "Britons"—not "Britishers."

If you're in doubt about what to do at any time look for a man wearing a badge either of the Thirty Club, Publicity Club or other British organization. And if that should prove fruitless, ask for Andrew Milne—he'll be everywhere.

Remember, you're not out of touch with either side on your ship. For three or four days you can keep on sending wireless letters back home from the ship for a nominal charge if you feel that way.

Don't take too seriously the suggestion that Community Singing at the General Sessions is not scheduled. I fancy our boys are a bit nervous about their voices, but most of them know the following songs:

"Horsey, Keep Your Tail Up,"
"Last Night on the Back Porch,"
"When It's Night Time in Italy,"
"Home in Pasadena," and they haven't forgotten "Gallagher and Shean" or "Bananas."

I suppose there is little need to suggest that "Sweet Adeline" be practised on the way over. To hear a couple of thousand lusty American voices in its delivery would be a treat entirely new to European ears.

Somebody's just told me to be sure to mention that "God Bless the Prince of Wales" ought to be practised, too, but I do it diffidently, remembering, however, that when the British delegation were going over it took four of them to remember the words of "The Star Spangled Banner."

Golfers are going to have a good time, for Lord Riddell has promised to provide the famous Walton Heath Course, a thousand dollar trophy, and lavish hospitality. Five trophies are being put up by other publishers also.

A little surprise gift awaits American delegates as they land in the shape of a specially bound wallet edition, in two volumes, of Green's "Short History of the British People." Some thousands are being bound in scarlet, with special title page in gold lettered, and they are the gift of Mr. L. G. Sloan, the British principal of the Waterman Pen Company.

As a passing thought, remember that British advertising men felt they could pay you no greater honor than by arranging for the Advertising Convention sessions to be conducted within the walls of our British Empire Exhibition.

And it's some Exhibition!

America Sees England

Quite the finest product of the magazine maker's art that has ever come to our notice is the issue of the EDITOR & PUBLISHER for June 21 While this is a magazine devoted primarily to the American journalist and his interest, this number of the publication is worthy of being passed on to the general public.

It is a 276-page book published largely in colors and upon special paper. The occasion for it is the sailing of over 2,000 American advertising men and women next week for London where there assembles July 12 to 19 the Associated Advertising Clubs of the world. The book contains page after page of pictures of English scenes familiar in history and story, of reproductions of pages from British newspapers, past and present, of sample advertisements of British products and of portraits of men who are leaders in British journalism and advertising.

The convention is to assemble at Wembley, where the British Empire Exposition is being held. This has been called the "$100,000,000 show." It is said to surpass the greatest of American expositions and although the American public has read little of it in the press the advertising men of the United States who are capable of "telling the world" to the highest degree, are sure to bring back a full account of the empire's resources on display.

The contact between these heralds of business, the advertising men, of both great nations, is sure to yield uncounted good in the way of a better understanding each of the other, out of which cannot fail to come more business and more friendship. British methods in business, in journalism and in advertising are different from American methods. No doubt each will borrow much of good from the other as a result of this first meeting of the Advertising Clubs of the World outside the United States. — Ashland (Ky.) Daily Independent, June 25, 1924.

SIXTH DAILY FOR EL PASO

Mexican Publisher to Establish El Internacional on July 15

El Paso, Texas, (90,000), principal city on the Mexican border and gateway to west Texas, southern New Mexico and Arizona, will soon have another newspaper. It will then be the only American city of fewer than 250,000 population with a half dozen daily journals.

Jose E. Campos, for six years with Excelsior in Mexico City, Tex., announces that he will begin publishing El Internacional in its own home in El Paso, July 15.

"El Internacional," Senor Campos said, "will be independent in politics. The journal will be of eight pages and sell for five cents a copy. One of its missions will be to create a better understanding between Americans and Mexicans."

Dailies now published in El Paso are: The Times, morning and Sunday; The Herald, noon, afternoon and week-end; The Post, noon and afternoon; La Republica and La Patria, both afternoon.

Other publications in El Paso are: Commercial Recorder, Commercial Review, Live Stock Journal, Labor Advocate and Revista Catolica.

El Paso stands on historic ground. Cabeza de Vaca led his brave but ragged followers there in 1536. El Paso was won by conquest from Mexico in 1836, when Texas was a nation. It was the first trading post and the first settlement in the territory, 265,896 square miles, which is now Texas. The city has the distinction of having doubled its population every ten years in the last 40 years. The geographical location is such that residents already picture El Paso as a city of 150,000 when the census is taken in 1930.

Two Minnesota Dailies Celebrate

The Fairmont (Minn.) Martin County Sentinel, which is still running in conjunction with the Fairmont Daily Sentinel, was 50 years old July 4. The paper was founded by former Lieut. Gov. Frank A. Day, who has been in continuous service ever since. The Rochester (Minn.) Daily Bulletin, has just celebrated its thirty-third birthday. It was started by C. Elliot & Son, both deceased. Glenn S. Witherstine is the present publisher.

JOHN SMITH
Willoughby, seven miles from Louth in Lincolnshire, is a typical village of the marshland, but it is of special interest to Americans as being the birthplace of Capt. John Smith, who has left us the story of his singular adventures including his romantic association with the Virginian Chief's daughter Pocahontas. This Lincolnshire soldier of fortune seems to have had an exciting career and it is boasted in his London memorial that he was "Admiral of New England." The venerable font in which he was baptised and the time-stained parish register in which the event is recorded may still be seen.

Vacationists Bring Big Business Into New York State

This is one big section of the United States where the national advertiser does not have to fear the effects of hot weather when he launches his campaign for new business.

What makes the usual dull season is the fact that the greatest part of the population simply pack up and start for vacation lands.

There is no dull summer season in New York State.

A good big percentage of those "vacation lands" are right here in New York State. That means that most of our natives do not leave the boundaries of the State and hundreds of thousands of visitors join us.

There is no need for us to leave for so-called vacation lands in other States. New York State has the seashore, the lakes, the mountains, the forests and the country. New York also has the finest cities in the land, where the people from the farms can enjoy their annual city vacation. If you doubt it just think of New York City, Buffalo, Syracuse, Niagara Falls and other cities which invite tourists and vacationists from everywhere.

We are mighty prosperous in this State, thanks to plenty of work in the factories and good luck in our farming—and our ability to offer such attractions that wealthy visitors cannot resist the temptation to leave a lot of their money with us.

All of us natives and visitors have one habit in common; we read the daily newspaper. We are tempted to buy if the advertisements ring true.

FOLLOW THE VACATIONIST AND SALES WILL FOLLOW YOU. These newspapers are your best aids to marketing in this big State that knows no dull summer season.

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

THE title "Introduction to Advertising" sufficiently describes the contents of a new book by Arthur Judson Brewster, head of the department of advertising at Syracuse University and advertising manager of the L. C. Smith & Bros. Typewriter Company, and Herbert Hall Palmer, associate professor of advertising at Syracuse University (A. W. Shaw Company). Doubtless designed primarily as a text-book for classes in advertising, it is such an excellent survey of advertising fundamentals that it can be perused to advantage by those actively engaged in the work. The fact that these fundamentals are so clearly set forth in non-technical language makes the book especially valuable to those who use the newspaper as an advertising medium.

After a general survey of the field, the authors become more practical with their suggestions on how to write advertising and how to display advertising. The next subject to which the authors give attention naturally concerns itself with where to publish advertising. In the section just mentioned, they outline somewhat in detail the special advantages of the various kinds of advertising media. Possibly the two chapters where the authors have made the most distinct contribution to the literature of the subject are those which discuss advertising tests and dealer co-operation. Nowhere, however, have they been more concrete in their suggestions than in the table listing the various appeals which may be used, the type of advertising that is appropriate, and the products that may well be marketed according to the desires or tendencies on the part of the ultimate consumer.

The volume concludes with a chapter on "The Ethics of Advertising." Frankly, the material in this chapter is too jejune not only in subject matter but also in mode of treatment. An honest difference of opinion might well obtain as to whether political advertising is so poor and so unethical as the authors would have the readers believe. Yet on this subject, "Truth in Advertising," much yet remains to be said. Remarkable progress has been made—due, for the most part, to reforms advocated by periodicals devoted to advertising.

The authors, however, have followed one plan that deserves commendation. They have reproduced only a few examples of poor advertising; they have wisely used the space thus saved for models which show how to hit the "bull's eye" of the consumer's pocketbook.

As a text-book for use in classes devoted to advertising the practical exercises will do much to lighten the burdens of the overworked teacher. These exercises, by the way, have already stood the test of being used by the authors in their own classrooms.

WILL IRWIN, who several years ago published in Collier's Weekly a series of articles on American Journalism, prints a postscript to that series in the issue for June 21 under the title, "Newspapers and Canned Thought." In this article he sums up for the lay reader present-day press tendencies and interprets for this reader the statistics which have been published in EDITOR & PUBLISHER. For instance, he says that the "trade statistics compiled each year by the EDITOR & PUBLISHER prove that the movement of the times is toward fewer and bigger newspapers." A little later in the article he again refers to the subject as follows:

> From the sober statistics of THE EDITOR & PUBLISHER the philosophers of the game plucked still another startling fact. On January 1 last 10 per cent of the newspaper circulation of the country was published in combinations—by companies or individuals owning from three to twenty-eight newspapers in various cities.

Mr. Irwin says very little that is new to the working press, but he does bring together some interesting observations which ought to start discussion in the newspaper clubs of the country. The connotation of "canned copy" is given a twist from which some critics of the press will differ. There is another side to this "canned copy" which ought to be considered before a logical deduction can be reached.

Honest doubt may exist about the workings of the law of diminishing returns. By this law the smaller newspaper, according to Mr. Irwin, is sentenced either to amalgamation or to evaporation.

Mr. Irwin, however, fails to distinguish between competition which eliminates the fit and that which eliminates the unfit. In my opinion wonderful opportunities still obtain for the ambitious young publisher—provided he has brains.

The Century Magazine, in my opinion, was for a long time a dead one. But under its new editor, Glen Frank, it seems today to be remarkably free from cant, and willing to pick up any live wire that is charging modern public opinion. This article by Mr. Morley, a typical illustration of exactly what I mean, will give the reader numerous shocks—but not enough to do him serious harm.

Mr. Morley's unique point of view between the pulpit and the press can best be described in his own words:

> There is truly some strange analogy between church and press. Whether it is the successful newspaper's taste for making itself clerical in architecture, or the successful church's appetite for front-page controversy; whether it is that they both make the cruelest and deadliest of enemies if annoyed; whether it is that the newspaper carries on the mediaeval church's lust of persecution; or that they both mobilize for war sooner than anyone else; or that both are vehicles of great realities, but vehicles so gorgeously mechanized and ritualed that the passenger has almost been forgotten—whatever the basis of the analogy may be, I am not sure; but I feel it to be there.

An incident that is usually labeled "Live Wire. Keep Away," is thus related by Mr. Morley:

> Here is a wedding party, at which appears the amazing stranger. He seems a man more fascinating, more charming, more utterly delightful, than any that those country folk have ever encountered. They are all very merry, the toasts go round, the wine runs short. But the ruler of the feast, turning to the stranger, says, prettily enough, I think, "With you here, water is as good as wine." Some one else takes it up, echoing the sentiment, seeking to add to it. "Right!" he cries. "Our friend here makes the water into wine. Here's to you!" And with friendly applause the gathering ratifies the compliment. One of the servants overhears and carries the incident into the kitchen. How quickly it grows and passes down the village street! "They've got some one in there who's turning water into wine!" Can it be denied that this is the way that human events are reported?

It will be noticed that Mr. Morley prefers to ask a question rather than to make a direct assertion. His question, however, after the shock is over, will keep the brain working for some little time. But the thought that Mr. Morley would doubtless like to leave with the reader is the following:

> Old Doctor Jowett said to Margot Asquith, "You must believe in God in spite of what the clergy say." And truly I don't think that any man who has worked in downtown New York can be much of an atheist.

JOHN W. CUNLIFFE, Director of the Pulitzer School of Journalism, has so many good things in a recent issue of the Christian Science Monitor about journalism in general, and journalism as a profession in particular, that I cannot refrain from quoting one paragraph which points out, not only the defects of the modern editor, but also those of the newspaper reader.

> The newspapers that can be accused of offense from the point of view of morality are a very small—almost infinitesimal—minority; what the serious minded—among whom I include myself—complain of is not immorality or indecency, but shallowness, frivolity, trivality, inanity. This is the real fault of the American press, as it is of every other press in a modern industrial democracy. If the American press is worse than the others—which I doubt—it is only because democratic government and the newspaper business are more highly developed here than elsewhere. We still have papers—the Christian Science Monitor and others—which an educated man can read with pleasure and profit, and those who are conducting these intelligent organs of public opinion are worthy of high praise. The sad fact is that the majority of mankind is incurably frivolous, and prefers comic strips or sporting news to information or guidance on matters of serious import.

Already a movement can be noticed to get readers not only to take the important news stories more seriously but even to read the text columns for education as well as amusement. I refer to the pamphlets which newspapers themselves are publishing to promote a more intelligent interest in men and matters of moment. Only a week or two ago I reviewed in this Department a pamphlet published for this very purpose by the New York Times.

THE pamphlet "How and When to Use Rotogravure," published by the Kimberly-Clark Company of Neenah, Wis., is packed full of information for those concerned with advertisements and advertising literature. After a brief historical resume of rotogravure in America, the pamphlet outlines how rotogravure is printed and offers suggestions for the selection of subjects for illustrations.

Most of the pamphlet, however, is given over to examples of rotogravure advertising. It concludes with a glossary of rotogravure terms.

Ads Increase Business

DES MOINES, Ia., June 28.—E. W. Bowman of the Warren Paper Co., Boston, addressing the Advertising Club this week, said that cutting an industrial plant's appropriation for advertising when business is poor is "like trying to eat an eight-course dinner with a spoon."

"Good advertising makes the volume of business greater and lowers the cost of production," he said.

If You Live In a Factory City

Here is an idea which may enable you to sell a weekly page of advertising for the next twenty weeks.

If there are many foreign speaking people employed in factories in the territory in which your paper circulates, it is probable that the employers of this labor will be glad to have the ideas of Christianity presented to workers in their native tongue.

Set a page ad with generous display, giving some principle of Christianity. Have this same matter translated into Polish, Italian and Hungarian (or other tongues) in smaller type near the bottom of the page for the benefit of workers from those countries. At the bottom put the list of manufacturers and jobbers who pay for the space. Plan a campaign of twenty weeks and sell the page on a pro-rata basis. You might also arrange to have this page printed on tag board stock and tacked up on bulletin boards in the factories.

The churches and all religious organizations in town will back your efforts. In some towns, manufacturers have been enthusiastic over the thing. It is worth trying.

Copy for such a series can be selected from the 52 ads, offered as Series No. 3 by this Department. The price is extremely nominal. Proofs will be sent without obligation upon application to Herbert H. Smith, Witherspoon Building, Philadelphia, Pa.

NEWSPAPER MAKERS AT WORK

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

H. M. ROBERTS—Goodnatured and Hard-Hitting

AN engineering education and experience plus training in salesmanship equals a good business manager for a metropolitan newspaper.

But this somewhat bluff, goodnatured, hard-hitting newspaper maker who rose at whirlwind pace to his present position from classified advertising solicitor in 8 years, is of the opinion that one glaring fault of the newspaper world is the fact that little or no attention is paid to the training of its personnel, particularly on the business side.

Given the grit, determination, and educational background of a Roberts, and a newspaper neophyte will rise with the certainty of cream to the top of his profession.

This, however, to Roberts' mind, is altogether a too haphazard and inefficient process. A man, he believes, should receive thorough training from the profession he has adopted.

"The average person beginning at the bottom of the ladder on the business side of a newspaper does not know how a newspaper is printed," Roberts pointed out.

"He cannot tell a prospective advertiser even so simple a matter as that an engraving reproduces better than a flat stereotype plate.

"It seems to me then it would be a mighty good thing for a newspaper to take its newly employed advertising solicitors in classes of 10 and put them through the whole newspaper publishing mill. It would take about month for each class to do this.

"Let them start in the composing room to receive instruction from the composing room foreman. There they could watch the news come in, see it made up, and from there they could follow the paper through the stereotype department, the press room and out into the street, receiving instructions from the head of each department.

"Some time should be spent in the circulation department so that the young advertising salesman could find out where his newspaper circulates and how.

"After a month's training on the mechanical end of a newspaper, the salesman should possess full knowledge of how the newspaper is printed. He would be equipped to answer authoritatively the many mechanical questions, which prospective advertisers are bound to ask him."

But, after all, the would-be newspaper executive put through a course of training as mapped out by the business manager of the American would, perhaps, be robbed of much of the adventure which has followed the career of H. M. Roberts since he entered newspaper work in 1918.

Graduated from Yale with the Class of 1905, Roberts had specialized in the study of engineering. His first position was in the engineering department of the New York Telephone Company. Remaining with this concern 6 years, he resigned to do bigger engineering work with the firm of James Stewart & Co., general contractors.

In 1914, with splendid engineering experience behind him, Roberts took up the second phase of his training which was to fit him for metropolitan newspaper work, the selling game. He became assistant sales manager of the Edison Storage Battery Company, and began travelling through Canada and the United States. He closed many large and difficult contracts.

By 1916, he was thoroughly prepared to begin at the bottom of newspaper work. He became classified advertising solicitor on the New York American.

In this department, Roberts first met that wall of indifference which men are so apt to come up against in newspaper work. He was given a pamphlet to study, explaining the mystery of agate lines and a few other fundamental points necessary for a newspaper advertising salesman. But no one in the office had either time or inclination to give him practical personal instruction.

Roberts made up his mind he would get this instruction. He took a classified telephone directory and hunted up the name of an advertising agency. He happened to pick out the Brown Advertising Agency, and, going direct to the head of that concern, he promised to get him an account if he would teach him the fundamentals of advertising. Roberts made good his promise, and the head of the agency took pains to give him real practical advice in the selling of advertising.

Having thoroughly mastered the classified side, Roberts decided his next step should be in display advertising. A. C. Woodward had just been appointed local advertising manager of the American.

Roberts made it a point to go to Woodward's office every morning and sell himself to that executive as a advertising salesman. Soon he succeeded, and was transferred to the larger field of display advertising. In 1918, Woodward left the American for the New York Tribune, and Roberts was promoted to his position. On Aug. 6, 1922, he had so demonstrated his ability as an executive, that he was made business manager of the American, in charge of the mechanical operations of the American and the Journal.

Roberts is also president of the Efficient Trucking Corporation, which now controls 76 trucks for transportation of roll paper and newspaper delivery. He is also president of the Newspaper Delivery Corporation, which handles the delivery of the American and the Journal, and is eastern vice-president of Hearst Publications, Inc.

Illinois

Is the KEY to the Mid-West Market

This market outranks all other states in the combined value of manufactured products and value of all farm property.

Eighty-nine per cent of the land area of Illinois is in farms and over eighty-five per cent is improved farm lands.

The fertility of the soil has caused the state to rank, for many years, as one of the nation's leaders in value of agricultural properties and the gross annual receipts of its agricultural products.

As an industrial state it ranks third, having 18,594 factories, of which the value of products exceeds $5,400,000,000 annually.

If manufacturers put their products into the homes of Illinois people with success, it will mean that an appreciable influence of that success will radiate North, South, East and West. Illinois is the key to the midwest market.

Every successful advertising campaign in Illinois depends upon these daily newspapers.

WHAT OUR READERS SAY

Improving News Writing

To Editor & Publisher:—It is to be hoped that you will have opportunities to continue making concrete suggestions for the betterment of the press such as is to be found in your editorial on "Specialization." This is a constructive proposal quite in harmony with Prof Bleyer's contention that the outstanding need of American newspapers is adequately trained reporters—which means, of course, men trained not in the technique of "getting a story" but in the intellectual capacity of understanding what they are writing about and of appreciating its significance. Outside the spheres of politics, legislation and finance it can probably be demonstrated that American reporting has declined in accuracy and authority in the past 20 years.

H. L. Mencken, in a recent signed article in the Baltimore Evening Sun, makes a slashing but scarcely exaggerated attack on contemporary newspaper standards. It is to be regretted that Mr. Mencken does not oftener drop the entertaining, if irritating role of enfant terrible and employ the sober and sincere analysis displayed here. But I think that he erred in blaming the men entering the profession for this deterioration. If the men entering the profession today have not the ability and high purpose of the older journalists, the system must be at fault somewhere. Certainly the system, and not the individual reporter, must be held accountable when the principal Boston morning newspaper in reply to a remonstrance, condones the selection—and as it happens, misquotation and partial misrepresentation—of a single striking and incidental remark in a long and serious speech and publication of such as a report of the speech.

I undertake no diagnosis and offer no remedy. Casper S. Yost, of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, in his book "The Principles of Journalism," tells us that in the publication of "human interest" news the "privilege and responsibility of journalism" are most abused. If this is true, perhaps a sharper line can be drawn between news writing and imitation of the short story. The work of journalism requires its own thorough preparation, whether derived from educational institutions or from experience, and should be an end in itself. It should not be regarded as a convenient stepping-stone to the commercial production of short stories or scenarios.

"Great Stuff"

To Editor & Publisher:
I left the office yesterday afternoon determined to get to bed early for a somewhat needed sleep.

"Foolishly?" I picked up the International issue of Editor & Publisher founded on the London Ad Club convention, consequently turned out the lights about 1:30 this morning.

I do want to say in sincerity that this is one of the most creditable presentations of a special problem that I have ever noted anywhere—I don't know which registered foremost in my mind—the overseas welcome or the Texas bid. Great stuff.

Your entire staff is indeed deserving of real congratulations. They surely have mine.

Cordially yours,
A. G. Newmyer, President, S. N. P. A.

Eclipses All Others

To Editor & Publisher:
After spending several hours going over your On-to-Britain edition I had hard work to keep from grabbing a suitcase and rushing to New York to get on a boat. You have published wonderful editions in the past but this eclipses them all. Congratulations and more power to you.

E. P. Adler,
Davenport, Iowa.

"A Remarkable Issue"

To Editor & Publisher:
I have been looking over the June 21st edition of Editor & Publisher, being the number having special reference to the convention of the Associated Advertising Publishers of the World in England.

This is a most remarkable issue, and one of which you may well be proud.

Permit me to compliment you and your associates upon its production.

With kindest regards, I am,
Yours very truly,
Mergenthaler Linotype Company,
Norman Dodge, General Manager.

"Sparkled with Information"

To Editor & Publisher:
Just a word to say that I recognize that the "On-to-Britain" number of Editor & Publisher was a gem in all respects.

Its 276 pages, from cover to cover, sparkled with valuable information and intelligent expression. And best of all it was directed in the interest of newspapers and newspaper advertising.

This number is only an aditional indication that you deserve the earnest and and substantial support of the newspaper fraternity.

Sincerely yours,
M. S. Linn,
General Manager,
S. C. Beckwith Special Agency.

"Proud of It"

To Editor & Publisher:
I am in receipt of the "On-to-Britain", Texas next number. I had this number for our "On-to-Britain" meeting of our club, which was held yesterday, and it would have done you good to have seen the wonderful interest taken in it. We are all so very proud of it, and know what a big hit it is making for our city and our State.

With all good wishes,
William S. Patton,
Vice-President, Advertising Association of Texas.

Promotes Good Will

To Editor & Publisher:
Please accept our hearty congratulations upon the wonderful "On-to-Britain" edition of Editor & Publisher.

It is an achievement of the first magnitude in the trade journal field and will unquestionably prove a real factor in promoting the spirit of good will between the advertising and publishing interests of the two countries.

Sincerely yours,
Johnson, Read & Company,
Carl P. Johnson, President.

"Hard Work Necessary"

To Editor & Publisher:
Your "On-to-Britain" issue is so remarkable that I must stop to send you congratulations. The more I look through it the more amazed I am and knowing something about the publication of editions of this kind, I am in a position to realize the great amount of hard work that was necessary to bring this edition to such a complete success.

Earnestly yours,
Harvey R. Young,
Manager of Advertising.
Columbus (O.) Dispatch.

"Significant"

Editor & Publisher:
Permit me to congratulate you on the On-to-Britain number of Editor & Publisher which has just arrived. It is an amazing achievement and should do much to bring the convention to the attention of the publishing world. Who can doubt the significance of the international conference with such an edition of facts and good will at hand? It establishes a place for itself for many years to come among the most effective journalistic and advertising editions of class publications.

Lawrence W. Murphy,
University of North Dakota,

"Remarkable Achievement"

To Editor & Publisher:
Let me congratulate you upon the wonderful "On-to-Britain" number of Editor & Publisher. It is a remarkable achievement and the entire editorial force deserves all the praise which I know has been showered upon it.

Yours very truly,
Audit Bureau of Circulations
Stanley Clague, Managing Director.

True Appreciation

To Editor & Publisher:
I am going to wait until I come to New York in person to thank the Editor & Publisher staff for the co-operation and favors extended to our Club and Texas in getting up this edition. Editor & Publisher has certainly won an everlasting place in the hearts of Journalism of Texas.

Paul L. Wakefield,

"A Wonder"

To Editor & Publisher:
I have just finished reading your "On-to-Britain" number and it is a wonder. On its great success I want to congratulate you.

STORY OF DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION

Tommy Gammack of the New York Sun and Harry Nicholas, of the New York Daily News, distinguished themselves as catcher and pitcher respectively on the New York Newspaper Club's unbeaten team, which last Sunday increased its string of victories when it defeated a team of visiting political reporters and artists by the score of 7 to 1 at the Yankee Stadium. After the game the players were guests of Col. Jacob Ruppert, owner of the Yankees, at a buffet luncheon. The same teams will play again July 6.

J. F. Nathan, general superintendent at the Garden for Western Union, told EDITOR & PUBLISHER on Monday that the press dispatches sent out from this convention represent the largest volume of any convention in his memory. Two hundred wires were kept busy 24 hours a day at the temporary office in the Garden basement.

The Brooklyn Eagle complained that the demonstration following Franklin D. Roosevelt's speech nominating Gov. Smith was so vociferous it broke one tube in the newspaper's radio.

Mr. O'Furey went to the Republican National Convention at Cleveland as a Sergeant-at-Arms and he came to the Democratic National Convention at Madison Square Garden as a member of the Nebraska delegation. He is famous for the editorial brilliance and commercial success of a weekly newspaper published in a rural community. The Cedar County News has the appearance of a prosperous daily. Its proprietor received his initial training in newspaper work on the Cleveland Press.

At EDITOR & PUBLISHER office this week, Mr. O'Furey said: "Every experience in life adds to the equipment of a newspaper man. I have been reporter, labor editor, sub-editor, circulation manager, editor and publisher and once I took an excursion into trade and learned the fascinating story of merchandising supported by advertising. Eastern people, I find, are not familiar with power and usefulness of the weekly newspaper, still the backbone of our national structure. You know there are some States where the daily newspapers are very scarce, the people almost wholly depending upon the weekly for general information. Some of the weekly newspapers are highly prosperous. Personally, I would much rather operate a weekly than a daily. I can make it more effective and have greater source of satisfaction. A good weekly will make more money than the average small town daily. There are, of course, complexities in small town journalism, but to a fellow who is trying his best to serve his community, with both interest for the mind and heart, there is an extraordinarily happy life experience. Whether you are in the country, or the big city, however, we take out what we put in."

W. J. Conners, owner of the Buffalo Courier and Enquirer, left the convention early to be in Florida July 4 for the opening of his new trans-state toll highway. He was accompanied by John J. Meegan, former promotion manager of his Buffalo newspapers.

Reuters Limited, British news distributing agency, covered the convention well, having 3 men on the job most of the time under the direction of Douglas Williams, general manager in the United States. Assisting Williams were T. A. Dixon, George Simonson, and John Miller.

The dean of the Florida delegation was T. J. Appleyard, of Tallahassee, president of the Florida Press Association. He is 74, and this was the eighth consecutive convention he had attended as a delegate from his state.

West Virginia
Has Power to Buy

Fuel minerals flow out of West Virginia in a steady stream, and gold—gold to spend for the things that make life worth while—flows back in.

The three most necessary minerals to industry—coal, petroleum and gas—comprise more than 90% of the state's mineral output.

The other industries are relatively small, but both the limestone and sandstone quarrying industries in West Virginia are important in that they furnish a large share of the country's supply used in manufacturing.

The mining and quarrying of these West Virginia products call for the employment of men of experience and training who command high wages. High wages mean a similar height of buying power.

The merchandising and advertising departments of the following newspapers will surprise you with details regarding marketing possibilities.

Advertising was given that job, on the ground that a good thing is of little value to a community unless the community has knowledge of it. The local newspapers have been used in space from 40 lines to a full page almost daily from the start of the new plan; in addition, outside newspapers in surrounding territory (in all, about 25 within a radius of 50 miles of Columbus) have been used, although loans are made only on property in volume of our business, we can and do conduct our business on a margin of 1 per cent. During the first six months of this year we paid all legitimate operating expenses and placed over $53,000 in our surplus account on a 1 per cent margin.

"Because of our conservative management, we have had no losses of any kind, consequently not a single dollar was taken out of this fund.

"In view of all these facts, woud we not be profiteering were we to charge our depositors more than 1 per cent for investing and guaranteeing their money? Depositors in a great many other building and loan associations throughout the state of Ohio receive 6 per cent. Are you not entitled to the same rate?"

Striking piece of educational copy in limited space

Franklin County. The Butler Advertising Company places the copy.

The public in general has a rather hazy notion of economics. Much of the copy has clearly and simply taught economic fundamentals and just how they work. For instance, one advertisement showed a picture of a home and the heading, "Selling Your Money," with this copy below:

"Your money is a commodity to be sold for the use of other people. The rate at which you sell determines your income from it.

"But it must be secured. The soundness of the security offered often determines the rate of interest.

"Where absolute security is obtained, 6 per cent is a fair market value for the use of your money.

"We accept deposits at 6 per cent interest and offer as a security the record of over thirty years' success and the good faith of this institution, with over $18,000,000 assets, backed by first mortgages on real estate conservatively worth double the amount of our deposits.

"Nothing could be safer, and your money left here will earn you 6 per cent without risk or trouble on your part."

Another advertisement is entitled, "If We Listen to the Voice of Conscience." It states:

"Can we pay our depositors less than 6 per cent? The demand for money for home building and home buying is now much greater than the supply.

"Hundreds of prospective home-owners are anxious to procure loans at 7 per cent, and will secure these loans by first mortgages on homes at not to exceed one-half their value.

"Because of economical management and the

Much of the advertising carries Mr. Van Sickle's signature to give it a personal flavor. Open letters to the public and questions-and-answer copy have brought very pleasing results. A booklet, "The Value of Your Money," in which Mr. Van Sickle answers the queries of an imaginary lawyer about the plan, has been an effective form of sales ammunition.

Because of years of standing in the community, the local response was immediate. It took longer to draw business from outside, but with the very persistence of the advertising that phase has developed steadily. The featuring of the plan has not scored a hit with competitors, but it has come to the attention of building and loan experts elsewhere and received much interest and praise.

Results talk. From assets totaling slightly over two and a half million at the inauguration of the basic new idea, plus advertising, July 1, 1920, growth was rapid. The company's 65th semi-annual statement just three years later showed total assets of $15,888,270.13, a gain of above 490 per cent! Since then, the growth has continued so that, with assets above $18,000,000, the company's business has actually sextupled. Depositors have increased by many thousands.

The Columbian Building & Loan Company has had the satisfaction of providing capital for over half the home building in Franklin County. It has enabled many to become owners of homes who, otherwise, could not have done so. It has attracted for a useful purpose savings which in many cases doubtless would have gone into wild-cat stock flotations.

"In most companies, the advertising is delegated to a subordinate, but I am of the opinion that the general manager of any institution can render no greater service to his company than by giving the advertising personal attention because, to a very great extent, the success of every business depends upon effective advertising," Mr. Van Sickle declared. "Had we not carried on educational advertising, our 'happy thought' would have been worth little and, instead of increasing our depositors by the thousands and our assets by the millions, we probably would have had a few hundred new accounts, with a comparatively small increase in assets."

Many a long-established business, which is content to jog along in a rut, might, through courage, vision and the right foundation idea, make sales history. That idea, however, cannot be "half-baked" and theoretical. It must be basic and sound and it may effect the whole plan.

But if the idea is right and all elements which enter into it are sound for all concerned, newspaper advertising often can play a truly all-star part in placing the "happy thought" upon a dividend-paying basis.

STRIKE PAPER ISSUED

Former Employees of Post-Intelligencer Scatter Paper Attacking Owners

As a startling stroke in the feud between the Seattle (Wash.) Post-Intelligencer and its former employees in the printing department, arising from the strike which began, May 31, when almost 100 stereotypers, composing room men and mailers walked out of the Post-Intelligencer office, 200,000 copies of Volume 1, Number 1, of the "Seattle Strike-Intelligencer" were issued, June 22, and circulated throughout the Northwest.

The 4-page sheet, made up in the accepted style of the Post-Intelligencer, was filled with denunciatory, bitter, satirical comment, several of the articles signed by Northwest editors, on the contents and make-up of Hearst's Seattle paper. It was written, edited, and printers by the strikers. The "P. I." issued a brief statement to the public showing its service was intact.

CANNING season in full blast. Cans and all the fixings.

There are 47 varieties of apparatus..

There are such patent processes as "pectin."

The grocer who makes a bargain offer of 50 pounds of sugar at cost, with a $10.00 purchase, would have something to advertise.

Decorations for lawn parties, such as Chinese and Japanese lanterns, oil paper parasols and umbrellas, colored electric bulbs and flags.

Lotions for sunburn and freckles.

It is a remarkably backward Summer, upsetting trade in many directions. From these adverse winds some good may blow to newspapers that locate trade vessels in distress and tow them into port.

ADVERTISEMENTS of building contractors rarely appear in newspapers, yet they are dependent for business to a great extent on local trade. While they may not agree to individual campaigns, one newspaper found them responsive to a bid for a general campaign with weekly (generally Sunday) half-page advertisements signed by the contributors.—Bert A. Teeters, Lock Box 295, Springfield, Ohio.

Here's a good circulation stunt. Analyze your city, block by block. Find out how many families there are in each block and how many papers you distribute in each block. What is the average coverage for each block? Which blocks in the city are below the average. When you have found the answer to this question go after the slacker blocks hard in order to bring them up to what they should be. In this way your circulation efforts will be directed to the places where they will do the most good.—Frank H. Williams, 1920 Spy Run avenue, Fort Wayne, Ind.

"A Lesson in Economy." Feature all kinds of repair "ads," from automobiles to watches. Why buy new when the old can be repaired, thus saving a considerable amount of money, which is actually the first lesson in economy. A live "ad" man with imagination can create something worth while for his paper by using the foregoing idea as a basis to begin with.—George C. Marcley, Republican-Journal, Ogdensburg, N. Y.

Full-page comic feature mats for eight-column newspapers usually come with trip borders at both sides and the bottom. Cut off these borders and you have a full-column space to sell on one side and a space to sell at the bottom. The excellent position will appeal to advertisers.—F. M. Tenney, Great Falls (Mont.) Leader.

Each week-end there will be a great number of people in your city play tennis. They will need new equipment—new tennis shoes, new tennis balls, new rackets, etc. It would, therefore, be a splendid idea for your paper to group together on a Friday a number of local concerns handling tennis equipment and get them to run advetrisements in this space urging week-end golf players to get their goods from them.—Frank H. Williams, 1920 Spy Run avenue, Fort Wayne, Ind.

People are slow paying grocery bills, despite the fact that edibles are essential. There rests an opportunity for a constructive co-operative campaign paid for by local grocers and run in display space with an attractive mounting. Make the copy short.—John Lewis Shissler, Times and Commercial, Cleveland.

A person's diet in the Summer-time should be different than his diet in the Winter, physicians say. Get an interview with some dietitian of authority in your city and on the basis of this story you should get advertisements from vegetable markets, groceries, ice-cream companies, restaurants, and other firms dealing in foods, to complete the page. Get up advance proofs of the story, and arm your advertising solicitors with this weapon—they will find that it conquers pocketbooks easily.—David Resnick, St. Louis Times.

In EDITOR & PUBLISHER, recently, I saw how an advertiser may use the weather report in connection with his advertising. We have a local furniture store that runs a single column, three-inch "ad" each day, featuring new arrivals and seasonable goods. Below his signature, he gives the weather report, and also the "top" on the hog market. Many farmers turn to his "ad" at once and get this information without rummaging through the full market report on another page. This idea may start a regular advertiser for you. —Donald O. Ross, Washington (Iowa) Democrat.

Warn Against "Schools"

Hundreds of persons of limited means are enrolled each year in so-called civil-service schools, under the erroneous impression that they will receive lucrative positions in the government service upon the completion of a course, the success of which is "guaranteed." The U. S. Civil Service Commission and National Vigilance Committee have issued a warning against coaching courses for government positions, denying that any "school" of this kind has any connection with any branch of the government and declaring that "no school can give advance information regarding examination questions."

Beach City, O., to Have Weekly

At a special meeting recently of the Beach City (O.) Business Men's Association it was announced that a weekly newspaper would be established in that town soon. William Gilbert, who recently purchased the Baltic American from George B. Chase announced he would establish the new paper.

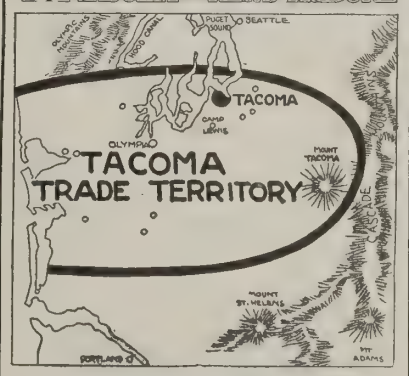
FOLKS WORTH KNOWING

ONE of the last things King George of Greece did before he was forced from the throne was to bestow a medal upon Carl T. Robertson, associate editor, Cleveland Plain Dealer, because of his "conspicuous services in bringing the true facts about Greece before the American public."

CARL T. ROBERTSON

The medal was sent to Cleveland while Mr. Robertson was abroad the schooner "Blossom," on a 3 years' cruise in the South Atlantic in behalf of the Cleveland Museum of Natural History. Mr. Robertson started on the cruise as naturalist for the museum but was taken ill with tropical fever and had to abandon the trip at the Cape Verde Islands.

Upon his return home he contributed a series of articles on the results of the trip and these were printed in the Plain Dealer and syndicated in other newspapers.



Two years ago he explored a new section of the Mammoth Cave, Ky., and his discoveries received wide attention. Mr. Robertson is a nature student and his "days off" are usually spent in tramps about the country in studying birds, flowers and plants.

The medal conferred by the King of Greece is a Maltese Cross, surrounded by a laurel wreath. The certificate bears the following:

"George II, King of the Hellenes, grants to Mr. Carl T. Robertson, Journalist, the Silver Cross of the Chevaliers of the Commandery of the Redeemer and we grant to him as evidence this certificate, signed by us and countersigned by our Secretary of State."

Jean Iliakis, former journalist and governor of Macedonia, recommended that Robertson be presented with the medal.

Fox a Balloon, Hound an Automobile —How Detroit Free Press Entertained the City on Sunday— New Stunt

What is declared to have been the first "Aerial Fox and Hound" race ever held in this country was staged June 22 by the Detroit Free Press.

Three free gas balloons, as the "Foxes," inflated with coal gas through courtesy of the Ford Motor Company, ascended from Detroit at intervals of 30 minutes. Automobiles, previously registered at the office of the paper, were the "Hounds." The Free Press gave as prizes to the first, second and third "Hounds" to reach the landing places of the balloons they were pursuing and present their registration cards to The Free Press representative in the basket. The prizes were $50.00 for the first, $30.00 for the second and $20.00 for the third. This meant dividing $100.00 between the three winners at each balloon, $300.00 in all.

The exact time and place of the ascensions were withheld in the preliminary publicity until the day of the race.

The pilots also were engaged in a contest entirely separate from that of the "Hounds." They were allowed to mark on a map the spot at which they believed they would land, after considering the wind and other weather conditions. Destinations for all balloons were selected within a distrance of not to exceed 60 miles from Detroit. Then the maps were folded and shuffled, and the pilots each drew a map. It happened that none of them drew the map he had marked, and so had to seek to land at a strange point. The one landing nearest his assigned destination won.

Great interest was manifested in the race. It drew automobiles of every type. At the landing place of Balloon Number 1, 18 miles from Detroit, two Fords were first and second and a Fiat was third. A Rolls Royce was entered and a Cadillac was one of the winners. Speed was not a consideration, but the "Hound" with the best judgment of the direction to be followed, and the roads that would enable him to follow that course, was the winner. The interest in the race on the part of the automobilists was not confined to the hundreds who registered their cars. Thousands of others, out on Sunday afternoon for a drive, followed the balloons and evinced great interest. The winner at Balloon Number 2 was a former member of Balloon Company 45 in the A. E. F.

In the exceedingly heavy traffic of Sunday afternoon, not an accident happened that was in connection with the race.

The race was refereed by Ralph H. Upson, internationally famous balloonist, and was sanctioned and approved by the National Aeronautic Association. A Free Press representative in each balloon determined which "Hound" was first, second and third to present his registration card at the basket when the balloon landed.

E. R. Hatton, Circulation Manager, and C. E. Planck, Reporter, staged the race for the Free Press.

PARKING problems are becoming quite general everywhere. What are the views of your leading citizens on this civic question? What various solutions can you secure by interview to help the administration and the police, as well as merchants in the congested district, cope with this situation in your town?—C. M. Littlejohn, Washington, D. C.

Is it cheaper to travel by automobile or train? Get your readers to discuss this in regard to definite trips to places your readers frequently visit. The automobile editor should first give a list of items that need to be included in arriving at the real cost for automobile travel.—W. B. Norris, Wardour, Annapolis, Md.

How many persons in your community know that letters and parcels posted for delivery by United States mail can be withdrawn by proper application? This little known fact can be made the basis for a good interview story with the local postmaster. Speculation over what causes swains and maidens, business men and stately matrons recall letters can be worked into the story in an interesting way. Even mail destined for points abroad can be regained. Letters which are already on their way to distant cities may be stopped by use of telegraph and telephone.—A. C. Regli, Eau Claire, Wis.

There is a federal tax on stills, a relic of preprohibition days, that is "still" valid. Naturally, no moonshiner intends to reveal his operations by paying this tax; but it can be used to send to jail those law violators who are clever enough to keep out on charges of manufacture and sales of liquor. Recently, three St. Louis County moonshiners were sentenced in Federal Court for failure to report ownership of stills found on their property. Look up this angle in your town.—David Resnick, St. Louis Times.

The Waco (Tex.) News-Tribune runs under a two-column head, "Hats Off Today To," little personal sketches of persons in the town who are more or less prominent in the day's news. During athletic meets of the high schools intimate articles of the boy stars were used in this column, and any particularly interesting human interest story about one person, or even two or three, goes well. The column fits the old saying that people are always interested in other people, and is the first thing many of the readers turn to.—Ruth Smith, Cuero (Tex.) Record.

Most reporters on their daily rounds pick up many items which are of interest but not of sufficient importance for a headline. Why not use them without heads and with only a black line separating them, under a standing head such as "'Round the Town" or "Heard by Wireless," etc.—A. C.

There have been plenty of stories printed about the most popular books carried by public libraries but few stories have appeared about the least popular books. Which, of all the various classes of books carried by the local public library, are the least popular—biography, fiction, travel, or what? What is the reason for this lack of popularity, according to the opinion of the librarian? A very interesting story could be easily prepared on this theme.—Frank H. Williams, 1920 Spy Run avenue, Fort Wayne, Ind.

Printers now lead the nation's workers in the size of their pay envelopes, according to the Industrial conference board. Thirty years ago printers worked for $12 a week. A Cedar Rapids (Iowa) Republican reporter got a good story in a series of interviews.—L. J. Jellison, Times Journal, Dubuque, Ia.

What do strangers think of your city? The Boston Post is playing up a series of interviews with people, famous and everyday, who are visiting the Hub of the universe. The opinions are constructive and usually favorable. They make appreciable more than before what they have. This would be a community-building idea for any city editor to exploit.—J. M. Mosely, 39 East Concord, Boston.

How does your paper cover the local news in such a way as to make sure that no stories will slip up? A story about the organization of the city department with maps showing the routes covered by the various reporters and data regarding the times when the reporters come into the office and so on and so forth would prove to be both interesting and entertaining and informative to all readers of the paper.—Frank H. Williams, Fort Wayne, Indiana.

Every time a new family moves into Brooklyn a reporter from the Brooklyn Eagle calls and presents a three weeks' free subscription, explaining that the daily hopes it will help them to become acquainted with the town. By the time the 3 weeks is up the family usually finds the paper indispensable.—M. E. Hussong, Madison, Wis.

CALLS FOR PRESS VIGOR

R. H. McCarthy Says Strong Editorial Policy Is Needed

AMARILLO, Tex., July 1.—High speed journalism of the modern day has sidetracked one of its most vital factors, a vigorous editorial policy, Richard H. McCarthy, editor of the Albany (Texas) News, declared in an address before the Texas Press Association in annual convention at Amarillo.

Mr. McCarthy argued that the country press is really the main spring of the nation and must mould the thought of the nation, "for," said he, "all those hordes living up there in the commercial centers of this nation are just country folks moved to the city."

A vigorous editorial policy has its advantages and its handicaps, he said. One of the advantages is that such a policy can mould the thought of the community for good. One of the handicaps, he declared, is the possible loss of business and friendships.

"It's a time for plain speech, vigorous editorial expressions, real journalism," he said, "the office of the editorial writer stands for things eternal, it crystalizes human sentiment, gives stability to the moral, religious and political fiber of the nations, is the pretorian guard of human liberty and the prop and stay of good government. Traveling the line of least resistance is what makes crooked rivers, spineless men and weak nations. The life blood of human freedom and the perpetuity of a democracy is the circulation of public opinion, vigorously expressed, either by mouth or pen.

"But in this day of modern equipment, facility and ease, luxury and wealth, there is danger that we will become soft. Let's not soldier on the job.

A. R. PRUDDEN JOINS FIRM

Third Brother in Prudden, King and Prudden Concern

A. R. Prudden, national advertising manager of the Cleveland, Ohio, Times, on July 7 will join the staff of Prudden, King and Prudden in New York City. A. R. Prudden is a brother of H. J. and L. C. Prudden of that firm. He has had many years experience in advertising and newspaper work in Buffalo, Pittsburgh, and Cleveland.

Financial Advertising Offers Problem

During the week Russell A. Law, of Guenther-Law advertising agency, made an illuminating talk on financial advertising before the staff of New York Times. "How," he asked, "can a financial house advertise successfully? What is the basis for it?

"An advertising agent runs over and gets the copy, puts it in the paper and sends out his bill. Easiest thing in the world. 'Why don't they put some interest in the copy?' you ask. There is usually a good reason for those things. There is not a financial advertising agent that could write a bond-offering advertisement. He has not the ability to do it. He is not familiar enough with the properties involved to do it. He has not the legal mind to do it. If they were to let him try he would let the banking house in for some serious loss of some kind. The omission of a comma might make the banker lose a fortune. It has to be passed upon by an attorney. And that is one of the reasons that we have to trespass on your time late at night so frequently. An issue is brought out and the attorneys are in dispute over a word in one sentence. I have seen them argue from 12 to 8 o'clock at night. It is a pretty serious job to ask an advertising agent to undertake to write copy of that sort.

"But there is a useful function of the advertising agent in preparing sales plans and copy in selling investment houses. When you consider that many of them are selling the same bonds you can see how difficult it is to formulate any comprehensive advertising plan that is suitable for any type of advertising. We have 600 accounts on our books, and I would say that over 300 of them are selling much the same securities at the same time and at the same price. The only differences are they are selling to different people and the characteristics of the house itself. They all have offices in the same locality, and you are called in to prepare a plan which is going to make that house nationally known and help them sell securities. There is the problem.

"The only way to meet it is to conceive some method of giving that particular house individuality."

It is said that EDITOR & PUBLISHER is the most thoroughly read trade paper in America—costs $4.00 per year.

Southern Farm Crops

Equal Forty-Two Per Cent of the Country's Total Crop Values

The purchasing power of the South in agriculture is now produced by a greater variety of crops than any other part of the country. No longer is the South dependent upon cotton as its single money crop. At the same time she raises tobacco, sugar cane, corn, wheat, oats, peanuts, rice, sweet potatoes, early vegetables and fruits in great quantities.

The livestock industry has grown along with the rapid advance made in agricultural pursuits. This industry alone adds wonderfully to the South's great buying power, and will continue to do so for the reason that livestock, in a great part of the South, can be produced by the fact that it possesses the advantage of all year round grazing, which lessens the amount of feed to be bought.

The South has about 35 per cent of the country's swine, 33 per cent of the country's cattle, and 19 per cent of the country's sheep.

Think of the South agriculturally in millions, many, many millions of dollars' worth of produce and meat products.

The South is prosperous; is only entering into its era of prosperity. It is rich in merchandising possibilities and no national advertiser or manufacturer who will investigate and study the facts can but know the ever-increasing demand for all kinds of supplies.

The South will respond to intelligent publicity. Advertisers in Southern newspapers get better returns on their investments, because Southern newspapers are more closely read and because there is less duplication.

The way to reach this market is by advertising in these listed Southern dailies—the progressive and wide awake dailies of the South. Use this list first.

The Dominant Newspaper IN BUFFALO

ONE of the most remarkable advances in the history of American newspapers has been made in the last three years by the Buffalo Evening News under the leadership of Edward H. Butler. His personal enterprise in bringing to the attention of the investment and banking houses in New York and elsewhere the excellence of the financial pages of the News has borne fruit. In achieving that excellence the Consolidated Press has been a vital factor. During the period of its greatest growth—the last three years—the News has been using the complete service of the Consolidated Press. The circulation of the Buffalo News has increased from 93,000 three years ago to 127,000 today—an increase of 34,000, or more than one third.

"I have been making a careful study of the Consolidated Press service," writes Marc A. Rose, Managing Editor of the News, "and I find it has been of unquestioned value to us. We have improved not only our financial pages but we have given our readers the business news, special cables, interpretive Washington dispatches, special features and sports dispatches of the Consolidated Press, which are a mark of quality in the American newspaper of today."

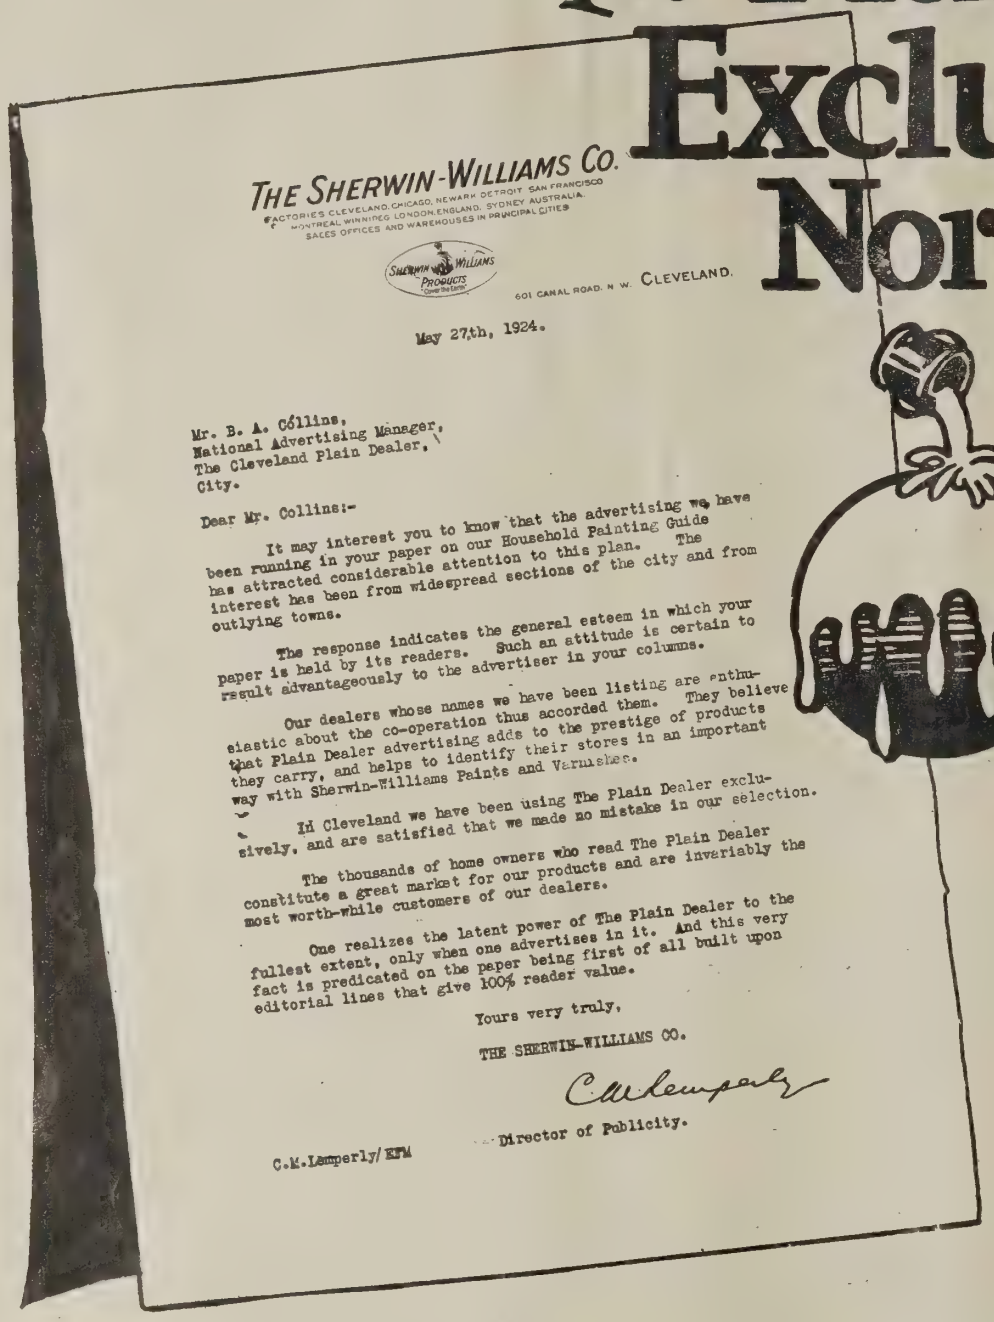
Mananas and Bananas

"Manana" is "tomorrow"—postponement. It is the keynote of life in the lazy tropics. It works very well there, for where there is "manana" there is usually a "banana" also, to tuck into a possible abdominal vacancy.

"Manana" is all right for banana land—but it would never do above the frost belt, where we have to cultivate what we grow and hustle like all get-out to pay the landlord.



We do our work today—and we read today's news today—or we get left by the hustling procession.

The Chicago man who is interested in investments, either as a buyer or seller, cannot afford to wait 12 hours for his financial and market news in tomorrow's papers. He reads today's financial news today—all of it—in

Mr. B. A. Collins,
National Advertising Manager,
The Cleveland Plain Dealer,
City.

Dear Mr. Collins:-

It may interest you to know that the advertising we have been running in your paper on our Household Painting Guide has attracted considerable attention to this plan. The interest has been from widespread sections of the city and from outlying towns.

The response indicates the general esteem in which your paper is held by its readers. Such an attitude is certain to result advantageously to the advertiser in your columns.

Our dealers whose names we have been listing are enthusiastic about the co-operation thus accorded them. They believe that Plain Dealer advertising adds to the prestige of products they carry, and helps to identify their stores in an important way with Sherwin-Williams Paints and Varnishes.

In Cleveland we have been using The Plain Dealer exclusively, and are satisfied that we made no mistake in our selection.

The thousands of home owners who read The Plain Dealer constitute a great market for our products and are invariably the most worth-while customers of our dealers.

One realizes the latent power of The Plain Dealer to the fullest extent, only when one advertises in it. And this very fact is predicated on the paper being first of all built upon editorial lines that give 100% reader value.

Yours very truly,

THE SHERWIN-WILLIAMS CO.

C.M. Lemperly

Director of Publicity.

Here is just another example of a nationally-known leader in its line recognizing "The Plain Dealer ALONE Will Sell It" in this great, prosperous Northern Ohio Market.

Sherwin-Williams is just one of several hundred advertisers who use The Plain Dealer EXCLUSIVELY to sell their goods. All these great merchandisers know The Plain Dealer has the BUYERS.

Of the hundreds of advertisers who use Cleveland newspapers to sell Northern Ohio, besides those who use The Plain Dealer ALONE, most of the others use it for part of their appropriation. They realize that this market cannot be covered without the use of the greatest force in it.

That's why The Plain Dealer regularly carries as much National Advertising as ALL other Cleveland newspapers COMBINED!

It is also a good reason why The Plain Dealer shows a GAIN of over 90,000 lines this year so far, completely overshadowing the gain of any other Cleveland newspaper.

This great Northern Ohio market is ready—waiting to be tapped. There's no time like the present—and there's no other newspaper reaches its Buying Power.

Advertisers! You Can't Cover the South with Magazines

Some National advertisers complain that in the past, sales efforts in the South did not yield good results. Now, there are two reasons for this. In the first place, it depends how far back in the past we want to go. In the last five or six years, that is, since the Great War, the South is a different country from what it was before. Conditions have improved from 100 to 1,000%. The number of automobiles has doubled and tripled; the mileage of improved roads has increased something like 500%. There are better schools, more money in the savings banks, more factories and so on. The manufacturer who relied on his experience a decade or even five years ago, would have to change his opinion now.

The second and most important reason why many manufacturers have fallen down in their efforts to get business in the South is the fact that they have relied on magazine advertising to sell their merchandise for them. You cannot cover the South through advertising in National periodicals. The reason is that magazines have smaller circulations in the South, in proportion to population, than in any other part of the country. The circulation of a large weekly in ten Southern states with a population of over 20,000,000 people is only 178,000. How can a manufacturer expect advertising in this publication alone, or with a few others, to sell his product in all this vast territory?

Advertise In Southern Newspapers That Reach Southern People And Know How To Influence Them---Then You Will Sell More Goods

Not only do Southern newspapers reach all the Southern people but they reach them in an authoritative way. Nowhere else does a newspaper mean more than it does in the South. There the newspaper is an institution. A man takes his newspaper like he does his religion or his politics—very seriously. The South, being the most American part of the country, with only a very small foreign population, has the same habits, the same customs and conventions. It votes alike, acts alike, believes alike and buys alike. The manufacturers ought to take advantage of this mass psychology and make the most of this opportunity.

Advertising in Southern newspapers gets your story to Southern people in the best way. It reaches them all. Let these newspapers help you sell your goods.

Use Southern Newspapers And Capture The Big Rich Southern Market

A recent statistical map showed the Southern states were better off from a business standpoint than the majority of other states in the Union. There is less unemployment in the South now—cotton is bringing big prices—the production of minerals, lumber and the development of water power—the increase in manufacturing, the building of good roads, the increase in bank deposits—in fact, the wonderful industrial improvement of the South since the Great War has made this section of the country the coming part of the United States. Advertisers would do well to bear these facts in mind in making up their Fall appropriations.

The monthly coffee of The Bulletin reader would float an ocean liner

"In Philadelphia nearly everybody reads The Bulletin"

Philadelphia's "Biggest Man"—the Bulletin reader and his family—consume eight and one-half million gallons of coffee per month.

You can reach this big fellow through one newspaper—and when you reach him, you have reached practically all of Philadelphia. Figure it out—there are 400,000 homes in Philadelphia and 100,000 outside.

Advertising Has Been Important Influence in Cleaning Up American Journalism, in Opinion of Boston Editor, Who Says Newspapers Which Shun the Ephemeral Can Be Made Profitable.

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

"ADVERTISERS have been an important factor in cleaning up the newspapers of the United States."

This statement was made this week by Willis J. Abbot, editor of the Christian Science Monitor, in an interview granted EDITOR & PUBLISHER in which he described the place in journalism of an international class newspaper, predicted the rise of a group of dailies like the Monitor in this country, and explained his newspaper's present organization and future plans.

"I may seem strange for an editorial man like myself to give the advertisers credit for this very evident change for the better in American journalism," he declared. "But I believe it is true.

"The great advertisers, both voluntarily and upon insistence of many newspapers, have cleaned up the advertising columns of the daily press," he explained.

"'Truth in advertising' has become more than a mere slogan. Revolting advertisements have become the exception where once they were the rule.

"And now the higher class advertisers are gradually impressing upon the newspapers the idea that they don't want their clean copy placed next to a revolting story.

"Consequently all over the country there is evidence of increase in clean, constructive newspapers."

But Abbot, an idealist, is nevertheless an experienced newspaper man. He has been through the Hearst school and realizes, he says, that there will always be sensational journalism.

"At the same time," he continued, there has grown up and there will continue to grow up a group of newspapers in the United States, which will, like the Monitor, stress the good news of the world."

As notable among the newspapers already started along "international and constructive lines," Abbot mentioned the Cleveland Times & Commercial, and the Chicago Journal of Commerce.

"There are certain fields, or centers, for international newspapers in the United States, which could function with or without church support," Abbot said.

"We applaud the contemplated move of the Methodist church to establish a daily newspaper.

"But under auspices of a church, a newspaper is handicapped as well as helped. On the Monitor, we run up against all sorts of prejudice on account of our name, while at the same time we are assisted considerably in circulation and distribution. It is true that about 75 per cent of our readers come to us through the Christian Science organization.

"The great danger of any newspaper published under church auspices is that it is apt to be made distinctly a church organ. On the Monitor we try to avoid this, and I believe we have been successful. As a matter of fact we print less about Christian Science than almost any other religion. As for Christian Science, we print the lectures delivered in the Mother Church in full, and that is all.

"Yet there is a demand, I believe, for international newspapers like the Christian Science Monitor, but without church support.

"Radio to a great extent is satisfying the demand of many people for bulletin news flashed on the heels of current events.

"A class of newspaper readers is growing continually that wants a complete daily survey of international current events rather than hasty reports of unusual happenings.

"These readers appreciate a newspaper that is virtually indifferent to beats; a newspaper that relies rather on carefully matured stories by men with precise knowledge of their subjects; a newspaper that will leave out or reduce to a minimum crime, local trivialities or disaster, and devote attention to the big news of the world, carefully covering educational, reformatory, ethical, and economic movements, and reporting national and foreign politics without bias.

"Such a newspaper could very well be started right away, I think, in New York, San Francisco, Philadelphia, Chicago, or Washington."

Abbot declared he believed newspapers of this sort would find ample support from national advertisers. He pointed out that the Monitor was on a paying basis and showed that each week they received in addition to advertising from American concerns, copy from European advertisers.

He favored Washington as the most desirable site for a non-sectarian international newspaper. Cyrus H. K. Curtis, he pointed out, and before Curtis, Thomas W. Lamont had opportunity to make the New York Evening Post such a newspaper, but "lacked sufficient vision."

"An international non-sectarian newspaper would have to be prepared to go to heavy expense for the collection of news," he continued, and expressed the belief that the editorial expense of the Monitor was 50 per cent greater than any other one normal American newspaper.

"Its news necessarily would have to be entirely different from that of its local competitors. Like the Monitor it could not use syndicate matter. News selection would have to be based upon its enduring value, rather than present interest."

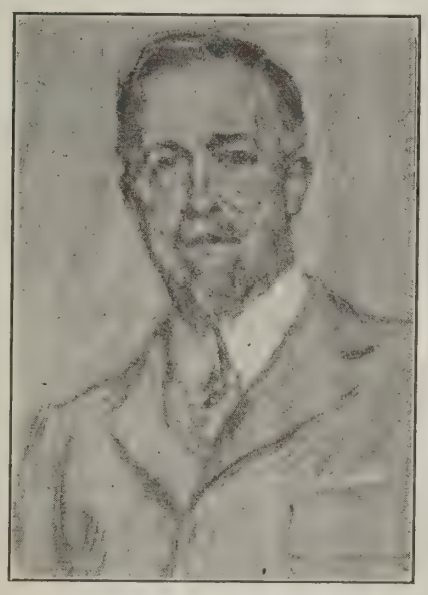
For the sake of comparison, Abbot traced the development of the Christian Science Monitor. Ten years ago, he explained, that newspaper began to develop its foreign service. It was then decided that its field should be international, and this policy has been adhered to ever since. As a positive subscription nucleus there were 2,300 Christian Science churches, scattered over the United States and abroad. News for the paper had to be of an enduring quality. With this in view a system of news collection was built whereby mail was used most extensively.

Now the Monitor has a four-story building at Adelphi Terrace, London, with an editorial staff of 15 under a general European manager, who has charge of correspondents in eight capitals of Europe and space writers in every European city.

"Every day now we receive about 6,000 words from Europe by cable, besides about 60,000 words twice a week by mail," Abbot said.

In this country, besides a well equipped home office in Boston, the Monitor has bureaus in Los Angeles, San Francisco, Chicago, Washington and New York, and regular correspondents in every large city and state capital.

During May the Monitor, according to Abbot, had a circulation of 120,000 daily. Of this total 16,000 copies daily were sent abroad, not only to Europe, but to Asia and South Africa. The California circulation, Mr. Abbot said, is larger than that in New England.



"At present we are seriously considering a Pacific Coast edition, but this will not be accomplished within two years," Mr. Abbot said. "This edition would carry all the features of the home newspaper, and its editorial policy would be directed from Boston. Following our normal line of development, a London edition is also a possibility of the future."

The editor of the Christian Science Monitor has had an interesting newspaper career. After graduation from the University of Michigan in 1885 he became a cub reporter on the New York Tribune. With a year's experience, he decided to become a publisher himself.

"I got the best newspaper education possible," he explained. "I went out to Kansas City and lost $10,000 trying to buck Bill Nelson at his own game."

Four years later he became managing editor of the Chicago Times, later playing a part in the merger of the Times and the Herald. In 1896 he came east and joined the Hearst organization on the New York Journal. From 1900 to 1903 he was chief editorial writer on the New York American. After short periods on the New York Sun and the Chicago American, he started his own syndicate covering Washington news. He became editor of the Christian Science Monitor in 1922.

"A class of newspaper readers is growing continually that wants a complete daily survey of international current events rather than hasty reports of unusual happenings"—WILLIS J. ABBOT, Editor of the Christian Science Monitor, Boston.

SPEAKING OF "SERIOUS" NEWS—

Michigan Editors May Ask A. P. to Wire More on the Weather

Editors receiving the Associated Press service in Michigan are to vote on the question of whether they desire a more detailed story daily on weather conditions. The request was made to Stuart A. Perry of Adrian, vice-president of the Associated Press, by the Pontiac Press-Gazette and has gained favor among other members.

It is desired by some members that the maximum and minimum temperatures be carried from various points in the United States daily. It was pointed out that several Florida newspapers carry this service.

The United States weather bureau has consented to supply the service to the members. It developed that some of the Michigan newspapers are already making a feature of the weather daily.

PRIME MINISTER TO OPEN A. A. C. W. LONDON MEETING MONDAY

U. S. Ambassador Kellogg Will Speak for 1,800 Americans Who Arrived July 12—Interesting Ceremonies Will Take Place at Sea

MORE than 7,000 delegates from all parts of the world are expected to attend the official opening of the international convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World Monday at Wembley, when Premier Ramsay MacDonald, representing Great Britain, and United States Ambassador Kellogg will be the principal speakers.

The Republic and Lancastria, official A. A. C. W. ships, carrying about 1,000 American delegates were to arrive simultaneously at Southampton today, July 12, where there was to be a welcoming ceremony, followed by a "Grand National Welcome" at Royal Albert Hall, London, Saturday evening. Other ships with the remaining 800 American advertising men and women were expected to arrive in time for the latter function.

Wireless messages from the Lancastria reported that on July 8 the British complement on board the steamer met on the boat deck to extend a welcome to the advertising men and women from America at the moment of crossing the mid-Atlantic line.

The ceremony included greetings between representatives of both nations and concluded with the hoisting and saluting of the colors and singing the National Anthem.

Both official ships will be gay with American flags at arrival in Southampton. Thousands were purchased and stored on board by A. A. C. W. officials before the boats left New York.

Three Days of Fun Is Plan of Paris Press for American Visitors

Although the delegates of the American Advertising Clubs will have but a short time to spend in Paris, the Association of Journalists of Paris and the authorities have determined to give the American newspaper visitors a reception worthy of French hospitality.

When the visitors arrive at Calais July 26, a reception committee of the Association of Journalists, the local authorities, and representatives of the French government will welcome them. On the way up in the train the delegates will be entertained at luncheon. On arrival in Paris they will enjoy a dinner in their honor in the Bois de Boulogne.

The next day, Sunday, special services are being arranged at the three American churches in Paris. The afternoon and evening will be spent at Versailles.

Monday will begin with a reception at the Sorbonne University by the Paris Press and the French government. This will be followed by a reception at the American Chamber of Commerce. In the afternoon the American delegates will be received by the new President of the Republic, M. Doumergue, at the Elysées, with a garden party in the palace grounds.

Tuesday, July 29, the delegates will visit the Agence Havas, where they will be shown over the different departments of the largest advertising agency in France. In the afternoon there is to be a fete organized by the high class trades of Paris, and a special performance at the Paris Opera.

The National Lead Company's Dutch Boy bids bon voyage to O. C. Harn and Mrs. Harn off for A. A. C. W. on the "Lancastria." Mr. Harn, besides his duties with the National Lead Company, is president of the Audit Bureau of Circulations, and will tell the British how the A. B. C. does its business.

N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE BUYS NEW PRESSES

Purchase of 12 Scott Units Practically Doubles Present Inadequate Equipment—First to Be Ready Within Ten Months

The New York Herald Tribune has placed an order for 12 new Scott units, practically doubling its present press room equipment.

Ever since the merger with the New York Herald, with the resultant increase in circulation, the Herald Tribune's mechanical equipment has proved inadequate. Each night use is now being made of 4 presses of the New York Sun, under an agreement with Frank Munsey.

Workmen are speeding installation of the new equipment, and it is expected the first press will be ready for operation within a few months. The new presses will all be equipped with Cutler-Hammer drives.

The Herald Tribune press room is on the third floor. When the building was planned by Samuel P. Weston of New York, a former publisher, space was provided for future growth.

Washington Herald Publisher

F. A. Wilson-Laurenson has just been appointed publisher of Washington Herald. He was formerly publisher of Atlanta Georgian.

Crime Increases, Not by Publicity, But by Courts' Failure to Punish, Yost Tells Lawyers

THE press was upheld in its relations with the bar at the 47th annual session of the American Bar Association in Philadelphia this week.

Dr. Talcott Williams, director emeritus of the School of Journalism, Columbia University, urged employment of trained men by the courts to make abstracts of court procedure, such abstracts to be made readily accessible to the press. He pointed out that the task of the newspapers in obtaining accurate legal news was extremely difficult.

Casper S. Yost, editor of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, scouted the belief that the press, "taken as a whole, had any serious derogatory effects upon the administration of justice."

"Defective justice in America is the shame of America," said Mr. Yost. "In the United States life and property are less secure from criminal violence than anywhere else on the globe that is not in a state of barbarism.

"Approximately 10,000 murders were committed in this country last year, fifty times as many as in the United Kingdom, while in such cities as New York, Chicago and St. Louis more crimes of violence are committed annually than in the whole of England. And this disgraceful condition is not due to a greater degree of criminality, but to the comparative immunity from punishment or correction that the criminal enjoys in this country.

"The instruments of justice and of law enforcement throughout America are manacled by a preposterous system of criminal jurisdiction that gives crime every advantage over justice, and creates the disgraceful paradox that law often cannot be enforced because the law will not permit its enforcement. Crime is disgracefully prevalent in America because the administration of justice is not sound, because, in fact, it not only permits but encourages crime."

Mr. Yost's summary of a situation for which the Bar Association itself is seeking a remedy was built around the topic, "Co-operation of the Press with the Bar in the Administration of Justice."

In discussing the co-operation of the press, Mr. Yost said: "In the main, the press of this country is directed by men of conscience, who realize their responsibilities to the public, and who are as deeply concerned in the sound administration of justice as are the most public-spirited members of the bar.

"The newspaper so conducted seeks accuracy above all things in its reports. There are difficulties that we all recognize and seek to overcome. The human element, the human limitations are constant obstacles to the statement or ascertainment of truth, in the press as well as in the courts, and neither in the press nor in the courts is the whole truth and nothing but the truth ever attained."

As remedies to fight the wave of crime, Mr. Yost urged a searching examination by the bar of what needs to be done to establish the administration of justice on a sound basis and then to array the forces of public opinion in support of concrete and uniform state and national programs.

Sensational news methods and sentimental and exaggerated reports of crime and trials are assisting materially in the decline in the actual administration of justice in the United States, Attorney General Harlan F. Stone told the Tuesday meeting. Mr. Stone took direct issue with Mr. Yost.

The attorney general held the press to be a contributing factor to disrespect for the law and its administration, but the main blame he placed upon his own profession—the law—and upon inefficient and corrupt public officials. Speaking of the press Mr. Stone said:

"How can we hope to secure popular respect for law or its due administration when the rights of litigants are daily determined by trial by newspaper in advance of trial by courts; when the public is encouraged to believe, by responsible leaders of opinion, that there exists in our polity any body or any agency, other than the duly constituted courts, which has either the authority, the capacity or appropriate facilities for determining the guilt or innocence of those charged with crime?

"Journalism has as high a stake as any other interest in the legal institutions of this country, for in them freedom of the press and freedom of thought and opinion have their only safeguard. Our profession may therefore urge upon it, on grounds of interest as well as of public duty, the importance of fair, intelligent criticism of the action of courts, and of accurate and enlightened accounts to the public of the functioning of law enforcement. It may urge the abandonment of that irresponsible publicity which is prone to distort or ignore the essential facts and hamper the administration of justice through the encouragement of that ignorance and misunderstanding on the part of the public which are inimical to the fair and impartial administration of justice. The ever widening and vicious circle of the stimulation by sensational news methods of an insatiable public demand for sensational news stories is corrupting public standards and distorting popular notions of the administration of justice. Sentimental and extravagant reports of judicial proceedings, with an exaggerated featuring of their dramatic aspects and of the personality and official action of lawyers and judges are familiar procedures by which the administration of justice is discredited; the soundness of public sentiment and judgment impaired and our legal system brought into contempt which it does not merit and which weakens and obstructs the administration of justice."

REPORT DIXIE PRESS HAPPY AND HUSTLING

Annual Convention of Publishers Well Attended—Important Future Plans Considered—Newmyer and Johnson Re-elected—Printer School Continued and Advertising Campaign Approved

By Arthur T. Robb, Jr.
Managing Editor, Editor & Publisher

SOUTHERN journalism, like the community it serves, is working today and planning intelligently for tomorrow. Even in the absence of recognized leaders of Dixie's newspaper thought, a number of them being detained in New York by national political duty which they placed before their personal and professional wishes, the 22d annual convention of the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association, held last week at Grove Park Inn, Asheville, N. C., was well attended and marked by several developments of high importance. Briefly, these were:

1. Extension of the joint advertising campaign of the association was approved.

2. The school for printers at Macon, Ga., was continued on a new basis of operation.

3. Approval was given to the idea of a code of ethics and the board of directors was constituted a committee under the chairmanship of W. M. Clements, Knoxville Journal & Tribune.

4. Approval was also given to a motion to seek the co-operation of other publishing and advertising associations in the organization of an "advertising audit bureau."

5. New by-laws were adopted, although the association disapproved a proposal that it be incorporated.

6. Employment of a paid manager to work for the immediate future under direction of the secretary-treasurer was decided upon.

7. President Arthur G. Newmyer, associate publisher New Orleans Item, was accorded re-election.

Following an address of welcome to Asheville by Col. James Hyde Pratt, head of Western North Carolina, Inc., which operates a number of highly picturesque pleasure resorts in the Blue Ridge hills around Asheville, and a reply by Past-President Frank G. Bell, came the introduction of distinguished visitors, who on Thursday morning included P. L. Jackson, publisher Portland Oregon Journal, and J. M. Blondell, auditor Baltimore Sun.

President Newmyer reviewed the association's work in his report which Editor & Publisher printed in full last week and turned the publishers' attention toward Walter C. Johnson, general manager of Chattanooga News, whose service as secretary-treasurer for the past eight years he described in enthusiastic terms. He told of Mr. Johnson's willingness to continue in office under condition that he be relieved of detail work by a paid manager and recommended that course to the association.

Mr. Johnson's nomination and unanimous election were greeted with cheers. Major Allen Potts, business manager of Richmond News-Leader, then took the floor, holding a flat package, which, after a short address, he presented to Mr. Johnson. While the latter was examining the engraved watch, gold chain and locket containing a photograph of his children, Major Potts raised the lid of a great mahogany chest holding a full silver service, which he directed the secretary to present to his wife in compensation for the many hours he had taken from her to give to the association.

Mr. Johnson "had a feeling that something like this was going to happen," he said, but was "completely overwhelmed" by the magnificent proportions of the association's tribute. He expressed his deep appreciation briefly and proceeded to report on his work for the year, details of which appear elsewhere.

President Newmyer then reported, on behalf of the agency relations committee, whose chairman, Victor H. Hanson, was absent in New York, that this secret committee had performed its work in a manner satisfactory to the board of directors.

Edgar M. Foster, Nashville Banner, who had been ill since his arrival at Asheville Tuesday, declined proffered relief from reading the report of the committee on Advertising, Labor and Business Office Affairs. He narrated the campaign undertaken by the association to advertise the South to important centers of national advertising, told of the favorable business circumstances in which the South now finds itself and the opportunities thereby afforded for a vigorous campaign. The S. N. P. A. members, he said, had contributed $15,000 in cash to place the copy in several newspapers and trade journals and in addition had given or pledged their own advertising space to the value of $97,906.06. Direct-by-mail advertising was also a part of the campaign, all of which was under direction of the Chambers Agency, Inc., New Orleans. Assistance of the S. N. P. A. committee was offered to other states and regional associations of newspapers planning a joint market advertising campaign.

Scarcity of good men for advertising and circulation executive posts was noted by Mr. Foster in the conclusion of his report and was also referred to in the report of Secretary Johnson. Mr. Foster advanced the suggestion that some publishers were employing high school and college graduates and getting better results than from the employment of older and more experienced men from other offices.

Labor activity of the committee included advice and assistance to publishers confronting disputes with their mechanical forces and the supplying of men to fill vacancies in these departments, the chairman reported.

Major John S. Cohen, absent on Democratic duty in New York, was scheduled to present the plan for an advertising audit bureau and Secretary Johnson did the honors. Briefly, the plan as submitted calls for organization of the Association of Agency Relationship, to be governed by three advertising agents, three newspaper publishers, two magazine publishers, one farm paper publisher, one business paper publisher and one managing editor. Its functions would be to set forth requirements which should be met by agencies from whom alone publishers would accept national advertising with the agency commission allowed. The A. of A. R. would investigate the qualifications of agencies and report to the board of control recommendations for acceptance or rejection of applicants for membership and would supervise operations of agencies through district managers and a staff of auditors.

By this organization, which, unlike the Audit Bureau of Circulations, would be under control of the publisher members, the A. N. P. A. and the S. N. P. A., and similar bodies would be relieved from consideration of the agency problem. Informal conversations have been held between members of the S. N. P. A. individuals and of the American Association of Advertising Agencies, the A. N. P. A. and other groups and general sympathy is reported to have been expressed with the plan.

The convention approved the request of the president for authority to seek officially the co-operation of these other associations in the organization of the proposed regulatory body.

Postage and legislation were reported upon by Col. Robert Ewing, New Orleans States, postage receiving 100 per cent attention. He reviewed the S. N. P. A.—American Publishers' Conference effort to have the Kelly schedule of postal rate reductions enacted, a fight which was complicated by Mr. Kelly's simultaneous measure to increase the salaries of postal employes, placing the burden of the increases on second-class mail. It is now history that the campaign of the publishers blocked this path to the desired revenue and that the bill was vetoed because it did not provide the funds to meet the pay raises, and it is also history the A. N. P. A. effort to obtain a rate reduction by an amendment to the revenue bill succeeded in the Senate, but was fruitless when the bill went to conference.

"Nevertheless," continued Col. Ewing, "these two vigorous fights by the publishers against further increase of these unjust postal war burdens has indicated in no uncertain terms to our Senators and Congressmen that the worm has turned at last and, if we all pull together and work as hard at the next session for not less than a 50 per cent reduction in our present rates, I confidently believe we will be successful; but, fellow members, every newspaper publisher, big and little, and every magazine publisher, must work and work vigorously and co-operatively, to bring this about."

Not so sanguine a view was taken by Major E. B. Stahlman, Nashville Banner, veteran of battlefields and Senatorial committee skirmishes these many years. Major Stahlman warned the S. N. P. A. that a report adverse to newspaper interests might be expected from the committee now investigating the cost and methods of handling second-class mail and that an adverse report would in all likelihood be accepted as final by Congress. It was up to newspaper publishers, he said, to present their definite knowledge of second-class mail problems to the committee, if opportunity could be obtained and to impress this knowledge upon Congress to forestall or overcome the effect of the hostile committee's report. If the publishers failed to get this information to Congress in emphatic and irrefutable terms, publishers might look forward to increases of millions annually in their postal charges.

Discussion of express vs. mail transportation of newspapers elicited the point that while express transportation was far cheaper than the mails for newspaper circulation, it was impracticable for the reason that the express companies could not distribute papers in many towns and villages where they had no offices.

Major Stahlman's views were supported two days later by Frederic W. Hume, executive secretary of the National Publishers' Association, who did not arrive in time for the early discussions. Mr. Hume gave a graphic description of the publishers' difficulties with Congress and with the Postmaster General in the fight for lower rates and against the bill increasing postal salaries. He quoted Postmaster General New as warning the publishers to accept the rate increase proposed in Congress, carrying a jump of $5,000,000 annually in postal charges, rather than the far higher rates which were likely to result from future legislation.

Serenity had marked the first morning's proceedings so far. An hour and a half remained by Mr. Newmyer's alarm clock when Harry Giovannoli, publisher Lexington Herald, was introduced to present the report of the committee on the printers' school of which he was chairman. "Now comes the fireworks," remarked one publisher in a stage whisper.

Mr. Giovannoli chose the narrative form for his report, telling how the school at Macon, Ga., was established by action of the S. N. P. A. in 1919 and opened in April, 1920, with six machines loaned by the Mergenthaler and Intertype companies. The school was under direction of Eugene Anderson, director of the Georgia-Alabama Business College and brother of W. T. and P. T. Anderson, owners of Macon Telegraph.

By July, 1921, Mr. Giovannoli stated, the school had graduated 75 students and was operating 39 machines. Publishers of the S. N. P. A. had contributed a fund for establishment of the school and had obtained the support of the A. N. P. A., which taxed its members $1 for each machine in their offices and turned the proceeds over to the Macon school. This support continued under A. N. P. A. convention authority until July 1, 1923.

Meanwhile, in January, 1923, the S. N. P. A. began an audit of the school's operations, which was delivered at the 1923 convention at White Sulphur Springs. It showed that the school was conducted under an agreement between the association's school committee and the Georgia-Alabama Business College, whereby the committee agreed to install all machinery and keep it in repair, and the college agreed to furnish buildings rent free, pay instructors and other operating expenses. Stock subscriptions were shown to have totalled during the period 1920-1922, $27,395. Equipment, maintenance and repairs were shown to have cost during this time $28,876. Inventory was $6,835, leaving net cost of operation chargeable to the committee at $22,043 for the period.

Tuition income totalled $73,370 and total operating expenses assumed by the college were $37,225, indicating a profit to the college of $36,145.

This report provoked considerable discussion at last year's convention, W. T. Anderson stating that the apparent profit resulted because the school's budget made no provision for the tremendous amount of supervisory work done by the school's head and for such other items as would ordinarily go into an institution's overhead charges. Mr. Anderson also told of a supplementary agreement he had made with the school as chairman of the association's school committee, whereby the former had assumed all responsibility for maintenance of the machines and would receive from the committee the sum of $5 a week for each machine in working order.

Considérable opposition arose to continuing the school at large expense to the publishers and at an apparently substantial profit to the operator, but other counsels prevailed. The school was continued under the existing arrangements pending consideration of all phases of the controversy by the new committee.

Mr. Giovannoli, as chairman of the committee, was the whole committee by his statement to the meeting, as none of his colleagues attended any meetings of the body. W. T. Anderson had endorsed a note of the school for $2,500, in anticipation of contributions expected from the A. N. P. A. and the note remained unpaid in October, 1923, as the expected money had not been paid by the A. N. P. A. This was finally settled by payment of the note by the A. N. P. A. after the April convention.

During the A. N. P. A. convention the S. N. P. A. directors decided to terminate the contract between its committee and the school as of July 31, 1924, and to notify the A. N. P. A., the Georgia Alabama Business College and the machinery companies of its action. The latter stated their unwillingness to furnish machines free to a school operated for profit and, as the feeling prevailed that the Macon school was in this class, it was agreed to withdraw the machines.

Mr. Giovannoli expressed the opinion that the school idea should not be abandoned under present conditions in the printing trade and stated that other schools conducted on a co-operative basis were operating satisfactorily. Future action was left without recommendation to the association.

W. T. Anderson then qualified as the "silver-tongued orator" of the occasion. He detailed in passionate terms his efforts to convince the S. N. P. A. that such a school was necessary, of his success in that field, and his further efforts to secure funds from publishers in all parts of the country, and his equal success there. He decried as unjust the clamor about the profit that the Macon school apparently had made, stating that for the past five years it had averaged about $7,000 per year and that the head machinist was paid that much to keep the equipment in order

He told the publishers that the 1,000 printers turned out by the school had cost the members of the S. N. P. A. about $3 apiece and had cost the publishers of the entire country who had contributed to the

1,000 REPORTERS SEE DEMOCRATS THROUGH

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

POLITICAL writers early Thursday morning this week completed reporting the most extraordinary party convention since 1860. And on Thursday evening the Newspaper Club of New York outdid itself in presenting them with the "World's Greatest Show."

Nearly 1,000 ,strong, these politically-inclined newspaper men and women had invaded New York and Madison Square Garden 16 days ago; had sat through nine desperate deadlock days; had pursued prominent Democrats from hotel quarters to club, to Garden; had fought their way through crowded aisles on the convention floor; and had button-holed "big bosses" under the speaker's platform for "inside dope," which time and again proved false.

Varied in their forecasts, the valiant one thousand and one agreed unanimously they were glad the convention was over, when on Wednesday John W. Davis was nominated for President and Gov. Charles Bryan for Vice-President. And the "one" was the long, lanky and renowned Jim Preston.

On Thursday evening those who stayed longest displayed their gladness at the New York Newspaper Club, where they cheered Tom Brown and his 30 saxophonists, Will Rogers and the Tiller Girls from the Follies, Estelle Carey from the Strand, Fred and Dorothy Stone, Eddie Cantor from Kid Boots, Hazel Dawn of the Keep Kool Company, Vincent Lopez and his orchestra, and the Four Marx Brothers, and other headliners provided under the direction of Charles Hambidge, of the New York Times, and Christopher Bohnsack, of the City News Association.

The last few days of the convention were the hardest for the newspaper men and women.

The majority worked Tuesday evening past midnight until 4 o'clock in the morning, and it was nearly 3 a. m. on Thursday before Gov. Bryan was nominated for Vice-President.

On Tuesday evening William Randolph Hearst scored the one outstanding scoop of the convention, obtaining for the New York American first news of the meeting between William G. McAdoo and Alfred G. Smith at the Ritz-Carlton Hotel. It was also then forecast that Davis would be nominated.

Wednesday evening's session was interesting from the newspaper man's point of view. Who in the press section failed in applause when the nominator of Maj. George L. Berry, international president of the pressmen's union, declared in reference to the Major's ability to run a country newspaper successfully:

"Greater skill than that has no man."

Norman E. Mack, publisher of the Buffalo Times, always in the convention limelight, shone brightly Wednesday as proposer of Smith's right to the speaker's platform and presenter of a resolution expressing the thanks of the convention for the "careful and accurate reporting" of proceedings by the press.

The New York World and the Baltimore Sun also received a vote of thanks by the convention for their hospitality.

Front seats of the press section were well filled during the last struggle. For "Among those present," see EDITOR & PUBLISHER of two weeks ago.

In the New York American section, Arthur Brisbane was conspicuous by his absence. Wednesday, it seems, is the day he devotes for writing his Sunday editorials.

The Chestertonian bulk of Heywood Broun also failed to loom in the stall of the New York World. Walter Lippmann, the World's chief editorial writer, who was there, informed the writer Broun was taking a month's vacation at Stamford, Conn. Lippmann seemed particularly happy Wednesday night. His newspaper, he believed, had followed out its editorial convention policies in excellent fashion. And Davis was a "splendid choice."

Newspaper women, it was agreed, did more work at this convention than at any other national political gathering in history. But many possibly hope it will be their last. The next 4 years is time enough to marry.

This statement the writer considers of utmost importance and significance, because the inspiring Imogene is far-famed as absolutely the only newspaper woman who has danced with the Prince of Wales. And His Royal Highness will shortly arrive in America.

Other women who did yeoman work included: Katharine Trenholm, New York Sun; Marguerite Ely, St. Louis Globe-Democrat; Anne Dunlap, New York American; Patricia Dougherty, Chicago American; Dorothy Shumate, United Press; Helen Fox, International News Service; Jane Dixon, New York Telegram and Evening Mail; Mary Watts, New York Sun; Louella Parsons, New York American, and Mazie Clemens, New York World.

Among the newspaper men, even the veterans Louis Seibold, New York Evening Post; Robert Lincoln, Chicago Tribune; Robert Bender, United Press; E. Barry Faris, International News Service; Frank S. Whitehead, Washington Post; Charles Michelson, New York World; Richard V. Ouhlahan, New York Times; Robert Barry, Philadelphia Public Ledger; George Holmes, International News Service; L. C. Probert, Associated Press; Raymond Clapper, United News; Louis J. Lang, New York American; J. Fred Essary, Baltimore Sun; Boyden Sparks, New York Tribune; William Hard, and many others too numerous to mention were fagged out when peace and harmony was finally declared.

By the tail end of the convention even the humorists had lost their laughter and didn't know where to find it. Yet they kept right after the funny bone until the finish. Among this class were: H. I. Philipps, New York Sun; Frank Sullivan, New York World; H. L. Mencken, Baltimore Evening Sun; Walter Mills, Oklahoma City Times; Will Rogers, McNaught Syndicate; Rube Goldberg, and Neil O'Hara, New York Evening World.

"Your correspondent has heard all the noise he can stand for the rest of his term in the newspaper business. From now on he is going down on Long Island somewhere and listen intently for hours on end to the growing pains of the oyster plant."

At any rate, this writer followed the footsteps of Fred Edwards, of the same newspaper, who recalled:

"Years and years ago we used to know a place called bed.

"We're going to find out if it is still there."

Seen and Heard at the Garden

AS the National Democratic Convention struggled into its third week, the nearly 1,000 newspaper men on the assignment, denied opportunity for sensational reporting, demonstrated grit and loyalty by remaining in their hard pine press section seats during the dull deadlock at Madison Square Garden.

Although there was little inspiration or excitement these newspaper men and women stuck to the story to the finish.

Veterans in the press section agreed it was the "most wearisome" convention on record. Many pointed out that this was one of few political pow wows without a scoop or two.

O. H. P. GARRETT of the New York World failed to report at the press section in the Garden Monday this week. With Mrs. Garrett and their few months' old baby boy, Peter Leigh Garrett, he journeyed down east to Maine and cool weather. Peter Vischer of the World staff took his place writing the daily picture story.

EDWARD S. BECK, managing editor of the Chicago Tribune, commenting on the "scooplessness" of the convention, recalled a soiled clothes basket in the Southern Hotel, St. Louis, used by delegates at that political gathering as a letter box to tip off individual newspaper men to stories which lead to sensational beats.

"Perhaps the character of the delegates has improved," Beck remarked.

Beck declared he believed New York an ideal political convention city from the newspaper man's standpoint.

"The hotels are convenient and the facilities are the best of any political convention I have ever attended," he said.

The Chicago Tribune Managing editor worked so hard during the convention he was unable to take advantage of the entertainment provdied by the New York Newspaper Club. Last Sunday, even, he worked until 2 o'clock in the morning. He and Mrs. Beck are going to take a long vacation immediately after the sessions. They plan to sail from Quebec on the S. S. Empress of France July 16 to be abroad until the first of September. They expect to spend part of their vacation on a motor trip through Cornwall and Devonshire in England, and part of the time on the Continent.

"MY ninth and worst political convention," commented J. Fred Essary of the Baltimore Sun. "It was the worst," he added, "because it was the longest. At the same time it was the easiest convention to report in my experience. Everyone got every item of news. No one discovered any hidden information."

Essary was of the opinion that the Standing Committee in charge of press arrangements of which James Wright of the Cleveland Plain Dealer is chairman, should be handed a bouquet for the fine work they did at the convention.

"I never saw convention facilities more to my taste," he declared.

This same sentiment was expressed by many other newspaper men to EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

"THIS was my sixteenth national political convention, and the press facilities here were in some respects the best of any of the 16," remarked James P. Hornaday, Washington correspondent of the Indianapolis News. "New York has treated the visiting correspondents with fine courtesy. As for the convention as a whole, I should say that it has been splendidly taken care of. If this had not been the case, the long deadlock would have worn out everybody."

JOSEPH B. FINAN, publisher of the Cumberland (Md.) Times wrote special articles on the convention for his newspaper as did Frank B. Shutts, publisher of the Miami (Fla.) Herald.

JAMES H. MOORE, editor of the Knoxville (Tenn.) Sentinel wrote editorial comment on the convention every day for his newspaper. It was his opinion that editors could arrive at better judgment by reading newspapers than by being on the spot. Moore is more than 60, and has been in newspaper work pretty constantly since he was 16.

JOHN T. BOURKE of the Cleveland News, who has been in newspaper work 39 years and has been writing politics since 1905, finds that now-a-days he has to write with a view to a large feminine audience.

"Women are becoming more interested in reading political news than the men," he declared.

Besides being political editor of the News, Bourke is president of the Ohio Legislative Correspondents Association. He was assisted at the Garden by Carl D. Ruth, Washington correspondent of the News.

HENRY GRIMES, formerly with the United Press, now running a business news syndicate in Washington, reported the convention for the Wall Street Journal.

EMIL J. STEINHAUSER, for 21 years secretary to Arthur Brisbane, taking many of his reports direct on the typewriter, reminds EDITOR & PUBLISHER that this was the first use made of a noiseless typewriter at a political convention. In 1916 at Chicago Brisbane dictated his running account to Steinhauser and the noiseless was the envy of the pencil-pushing brigade at that memorable G. O. P. steam roller demonstration.

PUBLIC VICTIMIZED BY WRITE-UP MILLS NOW GRINDING IN BIG CITIES

Grafters Posing as Newspaper Men Sell Glory Pieces to Stock Cheaters for Publication in Mythical Magazines—Non-entities Pay $50 Up for Publicity in Newspapers

By F. R. DANIELL

EDITORIAL NOTE Mr. Daniell is an experienced newspaper man whose acquaintance with the publicity mills began after the New York Herald's sale, which made him seek employment elsewhere. He was connected for a few hours with the organization described, having been attracted by an advertisement in a New York paper for "experienced fast re-write men."

FREQUENTLY the charge is made that newspaper men are taking bribes for printing or withholding some item of news. Instances where the charge has been proven are so rare that they are considered as fables of the city room. And yet that there is some ground for the complaint cannot be denied, for recently there has sprung up a group of unscrupulous parasites, of whose existence most honest toilers in Grub Street are totally unaware.

They pose as members of the press and wheedle large sums from their "clients" for their alleged services. While their operations are legal, this ring of "grafters" constitutes a menace to the public and is throwing a great deal of discredit on the entire body of newspaper men. In many ways these purveyors of false news and usually worthless publicity bear a strong resemblance to the "We Boys" of an earlier day.

These more modern journalistic highwaymen, by promoting all sorts of questionable enterprises, are potentially much more harmful than the "We Boys" who confined themselves to exploiting the vices of a selected victim. Now instead of selling a membership in a mythical club they sell subscriptions to circulationless magazines and charge staggering sums for questionable publicity.

There are at least three fairly large organizations of this sort active in New York and employing from ten to twenty men as writers, collectors, and telephone salesmen. Undoubtedly there are more.

One man seems to be the guiding genius behind the whole ring. In his office were a number of letterheads bearing the name of the second company, while the name on the door of the third company's office is simply a rearrangement of the letters in his name. He has a branch office in Philadelphia.

The method of operation varies according to the exigencies of the moment. It is very simple. From a rather expensive method of gratifying one's vanity it runs to the promotion of swindles of all descriptions.

In one case this man has bought space in a large city daily outside New York, and can guarantee publication of any article he wants printed, the only condition being that his client pay enough. Six or eight of his screeds appear every day in neat little boxes throughout the paper in the guise of "success stories" or "exclusive" financial news. In addition to this fruitful source of revenue he controls two magazines that will print any article that comes along if the person with whom it deals will buy copies enough. These magazines have no other circulation. Right here is where the new crop of workers differs from the "We Boys," for instead of the man who is approached by them being the victim it is the general public which suffers most.

This can best be understood by explaining more in detail just how the game is played. Advertisements in all sorts of publications are clipped for "leads." Quack medicines, bogus stock selling schemes, real estate developments and all sorts of other enterprises are grist for the mill. With no investigation whatever a man is assigned to write a story extolling the honesty and integrity of the company's officers and emphasizing the opportunity for sudden riches if the reader will buy stock or real estate in this particular firm. Often the writer has no information save the name and address of the company on which to base his story. Some legitimate businesses have paid for this sort of publicity but more often it is the other type that is more interested.

The use that is made of the C. O. D. eulogy is easy to imagine. Fancy the advantage a stock salesman would have if he could show a long article of this sort in what is ostensibly a New York business men's magazine or a similar story in a large daily paper. The power of the printed word cannot be overestimated.

On dull days names and addresses are selected at random from the telephone book or the city directory and paeans of praise are written around the name. This form is harmless for no one is the loser. The little shopkeeper who likes the idea of having his name mentioned in connection with Napoleon or Alexander the Great has a right to spend $50 or $100 for the privilege of seeing it so on the printed page. It isn't only the little shopkeeper, though, for doctors, lawyers and luminaries of Broadway have been known to send good-sized checks for having published what they would like to believe about themselves. This species is harmless enough. It is the man who is financially interested in having the public believe falsehoods about himself that constitutes the danger.

It is when the story is written and when the salesman is trying to induce the man to pay for it that they pose as newspaper men. As the prospect has usually not been approached before the article was written considerable tact must be used in getting him to pay for something he hasn't ordered.

He is called on the telephone and told that he is speaking to the New York office of the ——— Gazette. From there it goes like this. "One of our boys picked up a nice little story about you today. Would you like me to read it to you?"

If the answer is, yes, as it usually is, the story is read over the telephone. Then if all goes well the prospect is told that the man who wrote it is a newspaper man of unusual brilliance who is having a hard time getting along. The publicity hound is told that other men have shown their appreciation by a gift of $50 or $100. If the gift is not forthcoming of course the article is not printed.

That is for the harmless publicity seeker. Methods much more blunt but not so revolting are used on the promoters of stock-selling schemes and land developments. They are asked flatly for $100 for printing the article, payable when the paper is produced. In the case of the magazines, the prospect is asked to buy a large number of copies—usually the minimum is 500 at 25 cents each. His advertisement is solicited at the same time.

As not all the stories that are written can be sold it is necessary to keep a staff of writers busy all the time preparing the little glory songs so that the salesmen may have something on which to work every day. The aim is to recruit these writers from the ranks of the regular newspaper men. So far this phase has met with little success.

Recently an advertisement has been appearing intermittently in the Help Wanted column of one of New York's most reputable papers. Each time it is the same:

Wanted

Newspapermen—for rewrite, experienced, fast. Box B-27345.

The applicant for a position is told that he is to write a series of human interest and success stories for an out-of-town paper. No one could be fooled by that for more than an hour, for no newspaper printed could possibly use one-quarter of the stuff that is turned out. The legitimate newspaper man induced to seek employment by means of the advertisements stays just about an hour before he realizes what sort of business he is in. Almost invariably he leaves at the end of an hour or so. Those that stay are for the most part men that have never been known in the editorial rooms of the metropolitan papers.

THE REPORTER

Behold him!
He is the omnipresent, the ubiquitous,
The everywhereful!

He springs from nowhere,
Eager, as a hound is eager in the chase,
His nose sniffing
And his ears a-cock.

In his pockets are many stubs
Of pencils gone in service—
Stubs bit and chewed,
Sawed off and sharped again,
All waiting to leap forth
And mark their histories
Down on paper.

For him the copy readers wait,
And the linotypes,
The soup, the dope, the autoplate,
The great presses, tons of steel,
Elephantine Things that grind
To make men's fortunes or
To break their pride.

Into the thick of life he plunges,
Into its comedies, its tragedies,
Its heartbreaks and its romances!
Here listening to the halting lies
Of a too willing witness;
There viewing the remains
Of a hooch-driven Juggernaut!
Or dolled up for the party,
Taking names of those present
At Mrs. Thingumbob's Whatchacallit!

Behold him!
With two fingers he hammers
His intelligence through
The wreck of an office typewriter!
With sang froid and aplomb
Turns in his offering,
Watching sourly as it is ruined
By an incompetent underling
Of a cold-blooded Copy Desk.

NEW AND AUTHENTIC HISTORY OF THE HERALD OF THE BENNETTS

By ALBERT EVANDER COLEMAN—41 Years on the New York Herald staff

Beach, who seems to have been much more reckless and unguarded in his slanderous assertions than the "foxy" Noah, went a step further and questioned the paternity of Mr. Bennett's baby son. The result was, so to speak, cataclysmic: Mr. Bennett at once appealed to the courts and Beach was speedily indicted for criminal libel and also was sued for damages.

His reporter, Horatio S. Bartlett, swore that he was instructed by Mr. Beach to write the article libelling Mrs. Bennett. Before writing it, he remarked to Beach that "it would be very hard for Mrs. Bennett to be thus shown up in a public print." To which Beach replied: "I know, but it's the only way to make the ———— feel," adding that he couldn't touch Bennett in his business or about himself, and that his family was the only point by which to reach him.

Mr. Beach, through his lawyer, pleaded "guilty" in the Court of Sessions on June 9, endeavoring, however, to fasten the blame on Bartlett, and saying, "I regretted the publication of the story immediately after it appeared." Beach's retraction and apology was no palliation of the offence, according to Mr. Bennett's lawyers, and the Herald the following morning had a savage editorial, excoriating Beach and his "miserable advisers."

"In reference to Beach we have a word to say. His 'recantation' as it is called; his confession in court and out of court, we regard with contempt. If it be possible to conceive any blacker and meaner degree of wickedness than the libel, it is to be found in his recantation.

"After having spent several months in looking up among my discarded servants, whether he could not find some wretches base enough to swear falsely—after being foiled in his attempt to suborn Baker—after being abandoned by his own wife on numerous charges of crime and wickedness—this man, Beach and his advisers, have the bold effrontery to avow to the world that they had to make a thorough search in the private records of my family, before they could believe it moral and respectable.

"We perfectly understand all this business. The infamous conspiracy in which Beach has been caught did not originate with him. He is only the low minded vulgar villain, who has more effrontery, but less cunning than the others. * * *

"Private slander, secret espionage and all sorts of tricks were resorted to put down Bennett—to put down the Herald—to put down its influence and power. Spies were deputed to watch my home in Chambers street, and if a shutter was opened or closed, it was marked and told of as something very mysterious. If I went to Saratoga—to Rockaway—or to any other public place—little knots of the 'salt pork' aristocracy would get together and circulate every species of slander and falsehood against my family.

"The purpose was from first to last to destroy us—to destroy our family peace—to destroy our establishment by every species of falsehood, persecution, untruth and private slander. Happily we were made of that stern stuff, that could meet—resist and overcome the whole confederacy.

"The day of retribution is now come. We are in a stronger—a better and more invulnerable position than ever—and the knaves shall feel it, before it is all over."

In another editorial, Mr. Bennett said:

"From facts and affidavits in our possession we can unfold one of the most diabolical conspiracies to destroy and blast by perjury, slander and defamation the reputation and peace of a high principled, faithful, domestic and affectionate wife and her infant child, merely because the husband of that wife has succeeded in establishing and maintaining against all rivalry, the Herald newspaper in New York."

The case against Beach was adjourned from term to term.

The Herald editorially referred to these delays and efforts to modify the sentence, by giving a list of eleven criminals who had been that day speedily tried and sentenced, while Beach remained unpunished for his atrocious libel, in these scathing words:

"These persons were poor devils, and could not afford to have affidavits put in by way of mitigation, or pay counsel fees to cavil on points of law, and thereby secure postponements. Of course the punishment should follow the offence—like the report the flash of the percussion cap, or the thunder the lightning, but Moses Y. Beach is altogether a different personage. He is set down in the 'Book of Wealth,' published by himself, to be worth $150,000—he is the proprietor of several banks, excellently adapted for shaving the poor out of a quarter or half per cent on their hard earnings every Saturday. The Ulster bank—the Jacksonville Bank—the Malone bank, are the names of banks in which he has been concerned, one of which, the Jacksonville, broke and left its remains upon the community. Of course these features make all the difference in the world, and so they ought."

Finally on January 12, Beach was arraigned and sentenced to pay a fine of $250. "When it was heard, a general hiss rose up in the court," said the Herald.

Noah and the Restoration of the Jews

Mr. Noah had long eagerly advocated a movement to restore the Jews to Palestine, and in 1844 lectured upon the subject, directly appealing to the Gentiles to financially aid the great undertaking. Mr. Bennett severely criticized Noah's scheme, and boldly summarized the lecture as quoted:

"Christians, that Jesus, whom you worship, was an imposter—a humbug—an impertinent fellow, who, under the pretence of a mission from Heaven, created considerable popular tumult in Jerusalem and the land of Judea. He was very properly arrested, tried, condemned and put to death under the Jewish law. In this enlightened day, he, in all probability would have been more mercifully dealt with; but, as it is, you are blindly adhering to a system of imposture.

"We are the descendants of the men who executed this imposter. We have unfortunately and unjustly been deprived of our ancient heritage. Will you aid us in regaining it?"

The Herald concluded the article with the remark that Noah "brings to the task, the same vulgar mind, the same low ambition and the same narrow capacity of old."

The Herald's condensed report of the long winded lecture, to which an admission fee of 25 cents was charged, created a great sensation, and brought down on poor old Noah's head undeserved obloquy. The result was that he abandoned the chimerical dream of the Restoration, which remained to be solved as one of the results of the recent Great War.

Both Bennett and Beach ran various businesses "on the side." Bennett was publishing The Lancet, a medical magazine; the Athenaeum, a literary periodical, and the New York Artist Magazine. Beach issued various pamphlets, and dealt in the depreciated bank currency of those days, while oysters were on sale in the cellar. Both editors conducted small book shops, and the rivalry grew so keen and bitter, that Mr. Bennett, as a clever move, brought his infant son, "Baby Jim" (as he was known in the office) into the conflict.

We quote a couple of the announcements, introducing James Gordon Bennett, Jr., to the public:

"NEW LITERARY DEPOT OPENED:—James Gordon Bennett, Jr.,—in other words, le jeun editeur has opened at his papa's Herald Office, n. w. corner of Nassau and Fulton Streets a depot for the sale of all the fashionable and current literature of the day. He means by this to take the wind out of the sails of Moses Y. Beach, and to confine that sleek rat to his Jacksonville, Ulster and Malone shinplasters, including also his oyster cellar. For a catalogue of the works for sale see advertisement.

James Gordon Bennett, Jr.,
His X mark."

"THE GREAT LITERARY WAR:—The astounding competition for the sale of the light literature of the day, between James Gordon Bennett, Jr., le jeun editeur, and Moses Y. Beach, the Jacksonville shinplaster financier and oysterman, goes ahead with a perfect rush. All the elegant young ladies decidedly prefer to buy of le jeun editeur, on account of his sweet smile and his irresistible ways. Beach is now 49 years of age, and le jeun editeur is only 19 months, yet the latter says: 'Wa-wa-wa-boo', which being translated means, 'I'll lick Beach at anything he can fix it.'

James Gordon Bennett, Jr.,

New York, February 6, 1843.

An aged physician, a friend of Mr. Bennett, Sr., informed the writer in 1878, that Mr. Bennett frequently brought his son with him to the office, where he was the pet of the clerks in the counting room. Later in the day, Mrs. Bennett came after him and took him home.

SPECIMEN RELEASES AND RATES ON REQUEST

Politics may slow up business extensions and new ventures, but the buying power of the American people continues to create markets for fighters.

AS regularly as the country enters the first stages of a national campaign, the old tale is revived that "presidential years" are not good years for business.

Facts deny the tradition. The table printed on this page shows how little foundation economists find for the doubt which acts as a drag on the selling effort and sales volume of all who hold it.

For manufacturers who ignore it, the "presidential year" handicap hardly exists. They accept the ebb and flow of general business as unavoidable. But they recognize that the margin between normal volume of trade and its lower levels is so small that individual concerns can wipe it out by aggressive selling co-ordinated with intelligent advertising Particularly when competitors are settling back to wait for "trade to pick up again."

Market Zones Are Economic units

They know also that the United States, with its 110,000,000 mouths to feed and backs to clothe, is not actually one great sprawling market, but a group of regional markets, each with its own economic conditions, each largely independent in the main factors that create prosperity or depression.

It takes little in the way of inquiry and analysis to mark the prosperous zones—and only the simplest sales strategy to concentrate selling and advertising effort in the markets where people have the money to buy and are buying what they need and fancy.

A Market of Unusual Stability

The Chicago Territory is that kind of a market. It is almost alone among the economic divisions of the country in having no dominant industry, district or class that labors under a financial handicap. It draws its strength from so many varied sources—farming, mining, transportation, wholesaling and manufacturing in an endless number of fields—that violent fluctuations in business conditions seldom occur.

Only 3 in 28 Presidential Years were marked by business depression

Of 24 "off years" in business since 18 2, only 3 came in Presidential years. 13 of the 24 were bad years also in England and France.

(Table from "Industrial Depressions" by George H. Hull. Additional facts from "Economic Crises," by M. Bouniatian). Presidential years printed in full. Years of Depression are marked "D." Years when depression also occured in England and France are marked "D*".

Chicago, itself, had 6% more money in its savings banks in May than the average for last year, 1923—and 20% more than the average for 1920, at the peak of post-war inflation. Check transactions reported by local banks to the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago indicate a daily volume of business of $130,000,000. For an anchor to windward, Chicago also has a building and construction program—public and private work already begun or authorized and soon under way—amounting to the enormous total of one billion, three-hundred million dollars ($1,300,000,000). Other improvements still in the plan stage, will add another billion dollars to local expenditures for construction in the next few years.

Whose Products will they Buy?

Having money in the bank, money coming in and future earning power assured, the 18,000,000 people living in Chicago and The Chicago Territory form, right now the largest and most responsive market group in the world. Their buying power is normal for the products of American factories—from bathtubs and furnaces to cosmetics and chewing gum. They have to be sold, of course. If not by you, by your competitors.

Let a Chicago Tribune man call and show you how you can multiply your sales, cut your unit selling costs and speed up turnover in The Chicago Territory. You'll find he knows merchandising as well as advertising.

The "presidential year" bogy is only a stuffed shirt. Your 1924 business will be as good as you will allow The Chicago Tribune to make it.

PRESS FINDS RADIO AN ALLY, NOT FOE, IN REPORTING NEW YORK CONVENTION

Many Minutes Saved to Metropolitan Editors by Instantaneous Flash on Ballots—Wire File and Circulations Unaffected

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

Radio was very much in the limelight this week as a political reporter, covering the National Democratic Convention at Madison Square Garden, New York.

The radio trade estimated that fans paid $1,000,000 to listen in on the battle of ballots and addresses. This figure was based on parts purchased for radio sets and for the recharging of batteries during the convention period.

An audience of 10,000,000 persons was said to be a conservative estimate of those who tuned in on all important convention news.

H. P. Davis, vice-president of the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Company, called the "Father of Broadcasting," expressed the belief that broadcasting of convention proceedings "has aroused such national interest that the greatest poll of votes ever cast at a Presidential election will result." In a statement issues by Davis, it was recalled that four years ago the first political news was broadcast—the election returns in November, 1920.

By the editorial side of New York newspapers, radio as a reporter was welcomed as a most efficient friend, while circulation managers declared they were not the least bit "frightened over radio," and displayed figures showing big increases in newspaper sales during the convention period.

"We found our radio set very useful in covering the convention," declared Carr V. Van Anda, managing editor of the New York Times. "It saved us the trouble of having our men send frequent bulletins from the convention floor."

"It made many an edition possible for us," stated William Preston Beazell, assistant managing editor of the New York World.

On July 8, the writer found Victor Watson, managing editor of the New York American, seated before a radio set in his office in the American building. He had a clerical force about him keeping track of the votes cast.

"It beats the telegraph, our own reporters, and everything else," he vouchsafed. "The radio has enabled us to put editions to press every night before the balloting is actually finished on the floor. No. Radio hasn't cut into circulation. Our circulation has increased beyond expectations."

The New York Telegram and Evening Mail and the Brooklyn Eagle also made extensive use of the radio.

The effect of radio as a political reporter out in the field was more difficult for the writer to check up in New York. He learned from the Associated Press that the Boston Herald and the Washington Post were making definite tests, and awaits with interest statements on the results from these newspapers and from the many others, which must have used radio as a convention reporter.

Two methods of checking up the activities of Reporter Radio, in covering the convention for newspapers outside of New York, offered themselves: the opinions of press association chiefs, and Western Union figures. It would seem that in no way did radio cut into the wire news purchased by the nation's press.

"As far as I know, radio hasn't cut into our service at all, unless, perhaps, to a few outlying districts, where country newspapers used radio to pick up convention news," declared J. J. Welch, vice-president of Western Union.

Western Union handled "slightly less than a million words a day" to all parts of the country, according to F. S. O'Connor, chief operator in charge of the Western Union convention office in the basement of Madison Square Garden.

"In volume of news dispatched over the wires, this convention beats any other ever held," he said. "Approximately 600 to 700 newspapers were supplied with their own stories sent by Western Union.

"We had the largest and best facilities we ever had for handling a convention, consisting of two multiplex circuits and approximately 200 exclusive Morse convention circuits to all parts of the United States, placing dispatches direct into newspaper offices."

J. J. McDermott, superintendent in charge of the commercial department of the Postal Telegraph Company, said the Postal wires from the Garden basement handled an average of slightly more than 450,000 words daily.

Jackson S. Elliott, assistant general manager of the Associated Press, E. Barry Faris, associate editor of the International News Service, and Fred S. Ferguson, vice-president of the United Press Associations, all agreed that radio was in no way a competitor of press associations. None of the press services used radio as a news vehicle.

With prominent New York editorial men, these press association officials agreed in the opinion that radio, rather than decreasing sales of newspaper, rather promoted sales, in that it had aroused public interest in the convention proceedings.

THIRD MILWAUKEE SURVEY

Journal Issues 276-Page Printed Volume of Consumer Statistics

The Milwaukee Journal has published its 1924 consumer analysis of the Milwaukee-Wisconsin market in a 276-page printed volume. The edition contains facts and figures on the Milwaukee market as to package goods sold in grocery stores, cosmetics and accessories, household appliances, cigars, cigarettes and tobacco, men's clothing and radio. It also contains general information on the Milwaukee market and statistics on the Journal.

To obtain the information, questionnaires were mailed to 10,000 citizens selected at random from the city directory. Three thousand replies were used for the survey. A 6-page folder containing more than 150 questions was used. Separate questions as to the brands used, amounts consumed, buying habits, etc., were asked.

The 1924 survey showed the leading brands in each of the fields covered. In the chapter devoted to grocery products, leading brands are named for 39 products. Where changes have occurred in the popularity of certain products, merchandising and advertising activities are reported showing what effect these activities have had upon the sale of the products.

This is the third year that the merchandising and research bureau of the Journal had prepared a survey from the consumer angle. To supplement facts reported by consumers, a dealer investigation was also made. In many cases, particularly in the food line, it was found that dealers' reports did not coincide with those of housewives. Many products that had no consumer demand were listed by dealers.

Who's Who in the CONSOLIDATED PRESS

OWEN L. SCOTT

OWEN L. SCOTT, special staff writer of the Consolidated Press, with headquarters in Chicago, is one of the best trained newspaper men in the central west as well as one of the most graphic writers.

His dispatches analyzing the Robert Franks case in Chicago were praised by editors as among the best newspaper stories of the year. Everyone wanted to know the background of the two young murderers of wealth and education; the environment from which they were evolved.

Supplementing the spot news associations, these stories answered questions on the lips of every reader. Scott's revelation of the "third degree" methods of the Chicago police was a gripping story.

Owen Scott received his training in many years of service with the Associated Press. With the latitude of a special writer his dispatches answer the newspaper readers' questions "What is it all about?" and "What does it mean?" exclusively for the newspapers receiving Consolidated Press Association leased wire service.

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

EDWIN R. COLLINS

"NEWS, to be successful, must be a combination of accurate information and gripping entertainment."

That's good Hearst doctrine for you. It came from Edwin R. Collins, managing editor of the Los Angeles Evening Herald, a Hearst newspaper.

The Los Angeles Evening Herald claims the largest daily circulation of any newspaper in the far West.

In conversation with the writer, the Los Angeles managing editor had been asked how circulation is best built. He had come back with the standard reply:

"The success of a newspaper depends upon the quality and quantity of its local news."

Then as an artist mixes colors on canvas, Collins had spread over the dull gray of routine copy, the sunset hues of entertainment.

"The modern newspaper shouldn't be wholly confined to news," he asserted. "News is the first consideration, to be sure; but the real business of a modern newspaper is, above all else, entertainment."

Collins is a cheerful fellow. One can well imagine it is quite easy for him to seize upon and enhance pin point bright spots in the daily news. A veteran of many newspapering years, he of course realizes that each day a newspaper must be built out of the best things available; that some days the grip of entertainment will be flabby; the accuracy of the information doubtful. Yet, it is plain, Collins belongs among the beaming faces of optimists.

"Newspapers are on the upgrade," he will tell you. "Strictly speaking, in every department they are better today than ever before, mechanically, typographically, ethically, in the quality and selection of news and features."

And such talk is good news, when it comes from a man who has sung the song of the daily press for more than 28 years. They are usually so fond of the "good old days."

Collins first made the rounds for news on the Walla Walla (Wash.) Morning Union. There, for some time, he chronicled the small town doings, before going to Portland, Ore., where he worked on the Journal and Telegram. He was in Portland when the Spanish War broke out and served as both soldier and war correspondent.

On the Portland Telegram he had reached the city editor's desk, but he left to go back on the street for the Los Angeles Examiner. This was in 1905. He has been on Hearst newspapers ever since. He became night editor and in charge of the Sunday edition for the Examiner. Then for 3 years he took charge of Hearst's Boston American. In November, 1911, he returned to Los Angeles, when the Morning Herald was made Evening Herald. Since then he spent part of a year as news editor on the Chicago American. He was made managing editor of the Los Angeles Herald in August, 1913.

SUN STOCK OVERSUBSCRIBED

So Reports Long Beach (Cal.) Official, Probing Daily's Failure

In a hearing before Deputy Corporation Commissioner H. A. I. Wolch recently, an astonishing condition was revealed regarding the failure of the Long Beach (Cal.) Morning Sun. According to testimony the paper had a deficit of $143,000. Wolch will report to the grand jury and district attorney that there has been a violation of the state corporate securities act. Wolch points out that the stock was oversubscribed to the extent of $54,250.

R. L. Roussel, auditor of the company, admits that there is an operating deficiency of $113,000.

In selling the stock the company employed the unit method; 25,000 shares of preferred and 25,000 shares of common were offered, the preferred being 8 per cent cumulative. The par value of both classes of stock was $10, but two shares of preferred and one of common being a unit was offered for $20. Much of the stock was sold to small purchasers on the installment plan.

The real condition of the paper's affairs was not generally known until a suit came up in the Superior Court to have a receiver appointed. W. E. Garner, a well-known newspaper man, was designated as receiver.

EDITORIAL

MASTER AN ART

YOUNG man, wondering whether you are ever going to "amount to anything" in the newspaper business, take notice of the ideas which buzz in the pages of EDITOR & PUBLISHER weekly! To really succeed in this high-powered day, you must either be instinctively talented, possess some rare native ability, or you must closely study this business, find a specialty, know it through and through as no one else does, and find the right place to practice your art.

Amid many direct and indirect suggestions held out in these columns last week for the imaginative and truly ambitious, we noticed the remarks of Russell A. Law, of the well-known financial advertising agency of Guenther-Law. Said he: "There is not a financial advertising agent that could write a bond-offering advertisement. He has not the ability to do it. He is not familiar enough with the properties involved to do it. He has not the legal mind to do it." He declared that only corporation lawyers and bankers are able to write such advertising, owing to the technical character of the copy and the liability involved.

Mr. Law speaks from long experience and we do not question his statements. But we do believe that it is possible to train a man to write advertising copy for investments which are at once true and legally sound and much more entertaining and plain to the average mind than the advertisements which lawyers and bankers write. Here, then, is a specialty field for some able man.

No day passes that some newspaper man does not appeal to us for advice regarding a new position. Many are able and find locations. They know what they want and how to "put it over the plate" when the opportunity opens. But sadly futile is the quest of the man who only knows that he wants a job, needs it for the support of his family and is willing to "do anything." Just as you are more interested in a fact than in a generality, so are you more interested in an employe who represents a specific need than in one of general and therefore doubtful service.

You know something about advertising when you know something about the distribution and sale of merchandise.

DIRECT-BY-MAIL FRAUDS

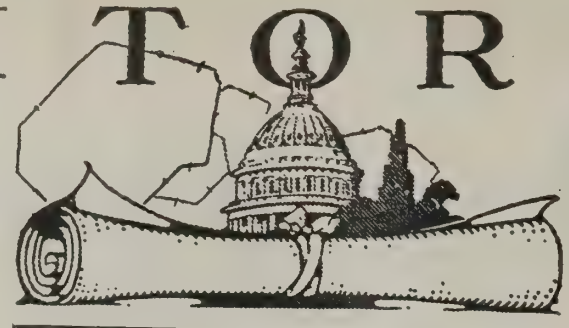
ANOTHER instance of the ease by which fraudulent advertising, barred out by honorable newspapers, is carried to the "sucker public" in the "direct-by-mail" vehicle, is revealed by the National Vigilance Committee of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World.

Here are some gems, taken from the literature of Harold G. Wise, so-called investment banker of Houston, Texas:

"Remember, we are not promoters, nor brokers, and we do no margin or promotion business. Our profit all comes from the very safe and conservative business of the Investment Bank."

"These units may be purchased through our 'brokerage department' for prompt delivery at $9.00 per unit."

"How would you like to make $750 in 60 days from a five-dollar bill?"



"We have been merchandising securities for 7 years without the loss of $1.00 to any investor."

"We will give you an opportunity to make a profit of from $300 to $2,000 in the next 60 days by an investment of $2.50 to $10.00."

The National Vigilance Committee challenges these statements which were sent broadcast through the mails in a continuous stream, an indictment was returned by a Federal Grand Jury and on June 16 Wise made a plea of guilty to charges of fraud.

"Direct-by-mail advertising has gained great popularity by promoters like Wise because periodical copy has been too carefully scrutinized to allow the 'get-rich-quick' fraternity to ply their craft undisturbed," according to the National Vigilance Committee.

Men who would scorn and socially ostracize a fellow caught cheating at cards, often only shrug their shoulders when they encounter the double-crosser, perjurer, frame-up thug and downright thief in the game of business.

PROVERBS

CHAPTER XXII. 1.

A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches, and loving favor rather than silver and gold.

RADIO NEWS SERVICE

EDITOR & PUBLISHER does not, for sound reasons, "view with alarm" the advent of radio-telephony as a news carrier competitor of the daily newspaper. It is folly, however, to ignore significant radio events of the past month as they have related to the great news of the national political conventions. Circulation reports will not, we are confident, show any appreciable effect, but it is a fact that broadcasting of the speeches and excited balloting at Cleveland and New York dulled the edge of newspaper reports among sections of the population of the large cities and many rural settlements.

The radio truck, with its battery of loud-speaker instruments, found its place on crowded city streets and in parks, holding crowds of idlers for hours and busy passers-by for as many minutes as they could spare.

The home radio and the restaurant radio were in active use and we know of instances where vacationists took radio instruments to the mountains, seashore and farm and got almost as much first-hand information concerning the proceedings of the conventions as did the reporters in the press stands.

Some newspapers took advantage of the situation and co-operated effectively with the radio, publishing as news the radio accounts of the big political gatherings.

We listened-in on the Madison Square Garden convention during the night session of July 7. The open proceedings, as they appealed to the ear, were as definite to us as to any auditor seated in the great hall. There was a good running description of the events, so we were able to vision the color of the event. As the reporters present were making totals of the balloting more rapidly than the official count, the press wires were probably a few seconds or minutes ahead of the official announcements. The chair promptly announced the delegation votes and the radio listener might himself have kept a tally sheet even with the sheets written in the press stand.

Except for what was going on behind the scenes, under the platform among the leaders, which required reporter skill to determine, listening-in was to all purposes and effects equal to actual presence in the convention hall. When the listener retired at night he was possessed of information he would ordinarily look for in his morning newspaper.

We heard the chairman of the Garden convention announce the tragic news of the death of President Coolidge's young son, which, by the way, was received at the Garden over press association wires and was thus announced to a listening public which does not contribute to press association operating costs, and we heard the convention's "groan of compassion," as Charles Michelson expressed it.

There is no gainsaying that radio is a wonderfully interesting method of reporting. It carries a new thrill. It is something to meet and EDITOR & PUBLISHER reiterates its suggestion that organized journalism consider this subject with a view to control of radio broadcasting as auxiliary to the newspaper, rather than permit it to take a competitive place in the general scheme of public information service.

It cannot replace the newspaper for many reasons, chief of which, as we see it now, is that no ordinary citizen can give the time that radio requires for a recital of the news. The selective feature of a newspaper, which is one of its leading attractions, is wholly missing in radio broadcasting. You accept what is given to you. In newspapers you select what you desire to read. The average reader is, for instance, only interested in the totals of a convention ballot. With the radio you must sit and listen for an hour to the polling of the states before you arrive at the desired total. Nothing would be so dull as a "radio newspaper." The announcer must wade through a column of stock market quotations, in which you have no interest, before he arrives at a sporting event or a news flash for which you have been waiting. There is no means by which radio owners can be called to their instruments to receive the class of news which interests them, unless such delivery be made on a time schedule and spot news ordinarily cannot await delivery by such method and retain its interest.

The great problem is to make radio broadcasting profitable. Free service merely to make a sale for equipment seems uneconomic. The day may come when instruments may be keyed to receive only waves intended for such instruments and this controlled service be sold by the week or month.

Broadcasting is at present falling off. We are informed by Carl Butman at Washington that the Department of Commerce only this week reduced the number of broadcasters to 534, 39 less than a year ago. The answer is that the service is not profitable.

It is reported that the Radio Corporation of America is at work on a plan to affect general, nation-wide broadcasting, from five or six stations over the country, operating independently of newspapers and rendering both entertainment and information service, presumably to sustain sales of radio equipment.

Radio is a newspaper subject, requiring the best thought of its votaries.

CALLING THEM "BOYS"

"GOOD morning, boys!"

The "boys" in question may be middle-aged, or old men.

They are being patronized by some iron-jawed political arrivist, whom they have seen climb to certain fortune and doubtful fame by the well-beaten skeleton route.

"Good morning, boys!"

He is all smiles and flattery when he wants you to write some self-serving thought into the consciousness of the public.

He is all scowls and his words dodge and hedge when adverse winds are blowing.

He writes "confidential" letters to your editor about your reports when they are "agin' the noble cause," but when you are puffing him he smilingly says, "Good morning, boys!"

FOLKS WORTH KNOWING

ALBERT S. CROCKETT, editor, World Traveler Magazine, who assumed his present post about 3 years ago, does not say, with stuffed sagacity, "I was a newspaper man once."

A. S. Crockett

He says, "I am a newspaper man."

Crockett worked on the old New York Sun, the Times and the Herald. Aside from other reporting on the Sun, he specialized in a column of interesting hotel news which was copied all over the country. Prior to that he was sent to London by James Gordon Bennett, first as reporter for the Herald, then as foreign correspondent.

In the latter part of 1915, the late George C. Boldt engaged him to be publicity man for the Waldorf Astoria. Crockett treated the hotel as a small city and gave himself assignments to obtain interviews and get the stories. During the war, he served as a dollar-a-year man on the hotel, restaurant, dining car, and steamship division of the Food Commission.

John McE. Bowman, knowing that Crockett wished to become an editor, bought the controlling interest in the World Traveler, and put the newspaper man in charge. Under the cloak of a series of noms de plume, he wrote several articles, a set of editorials, and numerous fillers for his first number, September, 1920.

Soon the manuscripts began to pour in. Now he has to look over from 100 to 200 articles. Advertising for the old publication apparently sold for what could be obtained, and the back cover brought $60. Today it sells for $475.

Paul Grimes, copy desk, Chicago Daily Journal, to copy desk, Chicago Evening American.

WHAT THEY ARE SAYING

ADVERTISING AND SPEED

"ADVERTISING and salesmanship can do little more than quicken the action of the article in selling itself. It formerly took three generations to build up a business. It now can be done in ten years."—C. H. Mackintosh, former president, A. A. C. W.

GOOD PRINTING WILL LIVE FOREVER

"GOOD printing will live just as surely as good literature or music. The difference between good and bad printing is much the same as that existing between Chopin's waltzes and 'Alexander's Ragtime Band.' Good printing is never blatant or obtuse."—A. Byrde Ingham, advertising director, Sheffield Fisher Company, Rochester.

WOMEN IN POLITICS

"WELL, they passed the resolution in favor of the child labor amendment and then all flocked to luncheon, where Jackie Coogan was guest of honor—something like the Congressmen who vote 'dry' and then go out and get a drink."—Miss Amy Wren, General Federation of Women's Clubs in California, as delegate for the Women's Press Club.

VANCE FOUND A WIRE IN OHIO TORNADO

A. P. Telegrapher at Sandusky Drove All Over Town in Commandeered Auto to Get His News Outside

An Associated Press telegraph operator, who knew that a story of death and terrible destruction was in the making and who was determined by all means to see that the "A. P." got the first break and a good early file, had the honor of breaking the news that a tornado had roared through Sandusky toward Lorain.

Jack Vance, operator at the Sandusky Register, turned the trick on the biggest story that that section of Ohio has ever known.

Vance had reported for duty June 28 at 3 o'clock to copy the proceedings of the Democratic convention. He was at his key when the tornado struck the city, unroofing buildings across the street and hurling wreckage against the office. Vance broke the wire to give the A. P. a 60-word bulletin on the storm—the first flash given the outside world that a twister was carrying destruction to the cities along the lake.

Before Vance could file a bulletin follow-up prepared by the correspondent, his wire went down. By that time the storm was at its height but he seized the copy and ran through the wind and rain lashed streets to the Western Union office. Not a wire there, he was told. He ran back to the Register office. An automobile was standing there. Vance doesn't know now whose it was. But he jumped in and drove to the B. & O. freight office—or what had once been the freight office. Then he hustled to the Big Four office. There he couldn't raise an outside point. There was one chance left. He speeded to the New York Central office, compelled the operator there to give him the single railroad wire still in service—and the story went out of Sandusky into Columbus.

Vance, with his first story off, hustled to the Western Union just in time to get the only wire set up at that place and then calmly, from dictation and prepared copy, gave the A. P. details of the disaster. Hours before staff men could get into Sandusky, the complete story of the storm which took nine lives in Sandusky and caused $2,000,000 property damage had gone into Columbus.

By KEN KLING

Says He Became a Cartoonist to Keep from Working for a Living

KEN KLING, New York World cartoonist, claims he will never amount to much because he didn't sell newspapers for a living when a boy.

KEN KLING

He tells about his career in this manner:

"Right off the reel I want to confess that when I was a boy I had no widowed mother to support,, and didn't peddle newspapers in the ghetto.

"That's one reason why I'll never amount to very much, because, according to the magazine stories, every bird who ever had any kind of success always got his first kick out of life juggling some small town dailies.

"After I talked the teacher out of a diploma on graduation day in P. S. 5, New York, my folks shipped me off to high school, never dreaming that some day I'd become a cartoonist and wouldn't need an education. It didn't take me long to wise up to the fact that Latin and geometry never get anyone a ham sandwich if he was hungry, so I slipped out of the place that made waxed mustaches and patent leather hair famous, and looked for a job.

"After wasting a few useless years in an importing house trying to distinguish the difference between chiffon and cheesecloth at 9 berries per week, I decided that I didn't care for the idea of working for a living—and so started to draw cartoons—bootlegging being an unknown art in those days.

"It was in 1914 while the New York police force was handing the public a big laugh by playing hide and seek with a crime wave, that I started my first comic strip called 'Hank and Pete.' They were two cops. I drew the strip for 3 years and might have been still kidding the cops today had not the Kaiser tried to do some kidding of his own—and in 1918 I handed myself a laugh whenever I took a slant in the mirror at the trick spring outfit the navy handed me.

"After parking a white sea-going hat over my right eye and tripping on bell-bottomed trousers for two years—Congress decided that I wasn't earning my $30 monthly, so back I flopped into the stiff collar and derby.

"In 1919 I joined the New York World and put the servant girl on the map with 'Katinka'—a half-baked pot wrestler. Katinka and I were pals until one day while in a stupor I got married. I don't remember whether I was married by a judge or a fight promoter, but anyway one woman was enough for yours truly, so I sent Katinka on a one-way trip to her home country and sprung a brand new sap in the world, Joe Quince! Joe is one of those hicks who's so dumb he thinks July the 4th was a king!

"He once thought that an X-ray had revealed a piece of bird shot in his head, but upon close observation the doctors found it was his brain. Joe thinks the softest job in the world besides drawing pictures is to manage a fighter—that's why he went to Alaska and dug up Moco, his Battling Eskimo. Joe Quince will last as long as you'll stand for him. I wish he was the "Star Spangled Banner"—then you'd have to.

NEW RATE FIGHT PHASE

Baltimore and Washington Publishers Want Cuts on Ink and Cores

The fight of Baltimore and Washington publishers for lower freight rates on ink and steel cores for newsprint paper took on a new phase this week when the Baltimore publishers and representatives of Washington Newspaper Publishers' Association gave testimony before H. Fleming, Interstate Commerce Commission examiner. The publishers' organization also has pending before the Commission a complaint that unreasonable rates on newsprint paper exists between mill points and Baltimore and Washington.

In presenting testimony on existing rates on ink and steel cores, the publishers asked that refunds be granted in case lower freight charges are ordered by the Commission. Any decision on steel cores in this case will affect every newspaper east of the Mississippi River.

The railroads against which the complaints are lodged are the Pennsylvania, the Baltimore & Ohio and the Algoma Central and Hudson Bay Railroad. The reduction sought would amount to approximately 50 per cent on the present rates on steel cores.

Appearing for the Baltimore interests were: R. S. Carey, Baltimore Sun; J. D. Warren, Baltimore American and News. The Washington newspapers were represented by T. D. Geoghegan, of the Washington Newspaper Publishers' Association; W. H. Souder, Washington Post; Charles R. Ruth, Washington Evening Star; and W. D. Haines, Times-Herald.

LA FOLLETTE MEETING ATTRACTS PRESS

CLEVELAND, July 8 — Cleveland's second national political convention held in the Public Hall auditorium and beginning July 4 with a spectacular demonstration by several hundred delegates and probably 10,000 visitors was a two-day affair, and was even more cut-and-dried than the June convention which nominated Calvin Coolidge to succeed himself.

The Independence Day convention, which set its approval upon La Follette for president and technically called the National Conference for Progressive Political Action, was followed by a convention of Socialists.

Arrangements for handling the La Follette convention were very good. Several hundred reservations were made directly in front of the stage for newspaper correspondents and telegraph and telephone facilities in a measure were a duplicate of those at the disposal of the 1,000 writers who reported the Republican convention, early in June.

Correspondents got a few thrills out of Robert La Follette's "declaration of principles" delivered by his son, Robert La Follette, Jr.

The convention was not broadcast but amplifiers in the hall carried the voice of stage speakers everywhere in the big auditorium. No runway was built for platform speakers, as was the case with the Republican convention.

While most of the feature writers who were in Cleveland a month ago were absent, they being held at Madison Square Garden by the Democratic political show, there was a good representation of the metropolitan dailies.

William J. Donaldson took the place of "Jim" Preston, kept in New York, in looking after seating and other press arrangements. He represented the national standing committee. James L. Wright, of the Washington bureau of the Cleveland Plain Dealer, deserted the Democratic show to come to Cleveland and aided in making things comfortable for the visiting newspaper people.

Paul F. Haupert of the Associated Press came on from New York to assist the Cleveland A. P. staff which was in charge of James W. McGuire, manager of the Cleveland office. M. E. Coleman of the Chicago A. P. office was also present.

The United Press corps of workers was under direction of Paul Mallon, assisted by the Cleveland staff.

The International News Service sent Kenneth Clark and William K. Hutchinson.

Locally, Wright, who wrote the leads for the Cleveland Plain Dealer, was primarily assisted by John Goad, labor writer for his paper. Marshall R. Hall featured the convention for the Cleveland Times and Commercial. Jack Heil, Ned Doyle and David Seitz and Alice Keuhn looked after the leading events for the Press, and William J. Lee covered the high spots for the News and the Sunday News-Leader.

Local labor papers, like the Citizen and the Federationist, were represented by their editors. Many out-of-town labor publications and trade papers were also represented in a special way.

Boston Writer Tells of Big Guessing Contest at Garden

By E. E. WHITING
(Political Editor Boston Herald)

FROM a newspaper man's point of view the best feature of the Democratic National Convention was that it lasted long enough and included candidates enough to give every newspaper man present a fair chance to guess right at least once. The convention was in session 14 days. If a trained newspaper man cannot pick the winner from a field of 15 candidates in 14 days, he is not devoted to his work. The difficulty at this convention was not to guess right, but to stay right.

As a matter of fact, there was a scarcity of "inside information" at this convention. A newspaper man could select his particular leader, boss, doorkeeper, prophet, hanger-on, lieutenant, hat-boy, or bell-hop, and write what he learned that way; and one way was nearly as good as another. There was just one way to foresee with approximate correctness the convention's outcome. That was the plain way of logic and a process of elimination. Here were many candidates, a dozen of whom were seriously in the race. There were two candidates in the lead, and it was a practical certainty that they would deadlock, as they did. The process of elimination then whittled away the remaining number. This is a process always possible when there is a large field of candidates—and only then. Also, it is a process that is as clear as crystal—after the event. Post-mortems are more or less interesting, but they deal with nothing permanently, except the corpse. Post-mortems of this convention are superfluous, or premature, anyway, because so few of the deaths incidental to that convention are permanent.

And as for the newspaper men who were inspired and who perspired during this 14-day battle of Madison Square, there were so many forecasts and prophecies made by them during the affair that they can spend four years before the next convention explaining what they wrote.

Seriously, this was a curious convention in its paucity of "official information" to favored ones. Men eminent in leadership in the Democratic party did their best by their newspaper friends with such information as they had. But the supply of confidential information did not equal the newspaper demand.

The newspaper men have had more exercise at this convention than they have had at any convention in this generation. Most of it has been guessing exercise. But I know we all have enjoyed it. The folks who looked after the newspaper men's entertainment have the gratitude and thanks of all of us. We have had a good time.

JUNKIN BUYS FAIRFIELD LEDGER

Transfers Ft. Madison Democrat to McGiffin Brothers As Payment

The Fairfield (Ia.) Daily Ledger, for 75 years owned by the Junkin family with only four changes in ownership during that period, has come into control of Paul S. Junkin, who transferred his holdings in the Fort Madison Democrat to Don and William J. McGiffin as part payment of the Ledger. Dean Taylor also held an interest in the Ledger, which has passed to Mr. Junkin. W. W. Junkin bought the paper May 26, 1853, and a quarter of a century later, to the day, his son, the late C. M. Junkin succeeded to the title. The McGiffens acquired control Jan. 1, 1917 and in October, 1920, through a consolidation with the Daily Journal took Mr. Taylor into ownership. The Tribune was consolidated April 1, 1923.

The new owner has operated a string of papers at Creston, Corning and Orange City, and for the last four years has been receiver for the Perfection Tire Company, and lately has been interested in the Junkin Paper Mills. He is president of the Iowa Press Association. Herbert F. McDougal, for two years editor, will remain in that capacity. The consideration is said to be about $100,000.

of the Cleveland Times and Commercial

"IN my contacts with the most efficient publishers from coast to coast," says Louis M. Cowgill, "I have seen in operation nearly all the systems for getting out a newspaper, but I must admit the Ludlow System is the only one.

"The high quality of print in our paper is largely due to our Ludlow System, as all display type in ads and heads is new every issue.

"The Ludlow handles a small ad or a large one quicker, better and cheaper than could be done in the old hand-set days. It takes worry out of the ad room."

Selling Churches Advertising

It can be done—but it's dreadfully hard work unless the churches have been in the habit of investing money this way. There are many clergymen and church officers who believe that no money should be spent by churches except for absolute necessities. Only after long persuasion by advertising solicitors will they see the advantages of investing money in advertising.

Many newspapers have found it profitable to sell a page to a group of merchants and professional men on behalf of all the churches in town. The names of all the churches are printed, and at the top a general invitation to worship somewhere, similar to copy offered by the Church Advertising Department of the A. A. C. of W.

Exclusive copy with special ads for special days may be obtained on request to Herbert H. Smith, 518 Witherspoon Bldg., Philadelphia, Pa. The price is nominal.

fund about $27 apiece. The Empire State School in New York, whose director received a salary, although the Macon school head received none, had cost its supporters about $49 per graduate. "What kind of business is this?" he asked. "You members of the S. N. P. A. contribute your $3 per machine to the A. N. P. A. and you have deliberately turned away contributions by the A. N. P. A. to the support of the school which you founded, the first of its kind in the country. You are sending your money to New York to be spent on schools in the East, or the Far West, or anywhere except in your school in the South."

He called upon the members not to sacrifice the work that had already been accomplished merely because of pique that a profit had been made incidental to the success. The school had done all that it had been established to do, it was a going concern and its success would have been far greater, he said, if the S. N. P. A. members had carried out their original agreement to give the school advertising in their newspapers. He did not care where or how the school was continued, just so it was not allowed to die and carry with it all the good results that the past five years had brought about.

That about settled the argument. There was further discussion, but there was no opposition to a motion originally made by Mr. Anderson that the S. N. P. A. "create or continue" a linotype school and that its committee be empowered to make satisfactory terms or arrangements.

Under this resolution, the Messrs. Anderson conferred with the committee until the small hours of Saturday morning and agreed to continue the Macon school as the S. N. P. A. school.

Eugene Anderson will be paid a salary as director.

The S. N. P. A. committee will lease the machines from the Mergenthaler and Intertype companies.

Reports will be made at regular intervals by the school to the committee, showing the state of the finances and the progress of the students.

The association will not concern itself with the profit or loss resulting from operations.

So ended the first day, Mr. Newmyer's alarm clock jangling a call to adjournment, luncheon, and golf at 1.30 p. m. sharp.

It rang again next morning in the lobby and on the council room table at 9 o'clock. Secretary Johnson started the ball rolling by reporting for the committee on traffic affairs. There was a note of triumph in his tale of how the committee had secured readjustment of the freight rate on newsprint paper by the principal railroads carrying newsprint to Southern points, thereby saving for many members several times the cost of their annual dues to the association. He also told how the committee had forestalled efforts of the carriers to change the description and classification of newsprint, with resultant increases in rate aggregating 10 per cent, and another plan to increase rates to certain Southern points.

Reduction in freight rate on cores shipped north to manufacturers had also been secured in several instances, Mr. Johnson reported, the new rate being only slightly higher than the rate on newsprint. The committee is now working to bring these rates on a parity.

Another achievement of the committee was the establishment of a minimum carload weight of 24,000 lbs., the carriers having held out for a minimum of 36,000 lbs. The Southern and Eastern carriers agreed last year and the water transportation lines had already concurred.

Threatened enforcement by the Shipping Board of Section 28 of the Merchant Marine Act, practically compelling shipment of foreign paper in American bottoms was averted by the committee's efforts, and it included in its report a recommendation that foreign paper makers be asked to ship their product in American vessels.

Several other inequalities in rates were noted as having been corrected and the committee recommended that the members consider united action in the handling of the 100,000 or more tons of freight controlled by Southern publishers to the end that rates might be stabilized and shipments be more carefully handled.

Successful conclusion of a fight before the Tennessee Railroad and Public Utilities Commission to prevent the American Railway Express Company from increasing rates on newspapers transported in intrastate commerce. The Tennessee publishers succeeded in having set aside the company's schedule increasing rates from 50 cents to $1 per 100 lbs.

V. B. Kemp, of the Washington & Lee School of Journalism committee informed the membership on behalf of Dr. John S. Cohen (the LL.D was conferred by Washington & Lee University a month ago on the Atlanta editor for dis-

ETHICS CODE PROPOSED BY KNOXVILLE JOURNAL EDITOR

WE recognize that as a newspaper's existence requires capital, justly entitled to a fair and reasonable profit, it must be operated upon sound business principles, which, however, need not and should not come in conflict with the duty it owes to the public, to the country and to the community that supports it.

Since newspapers were founded essentially for the purpose of providing news, a newspaper's first duty is to print that news honestly and fairly to all, unbiased by any other consideration, even including its own editorial opinion.

Its second duty is that of construing honestly and fairly in its editorial columns the happenings of the times at home and abroad, to the end that the people may realize their full benefits under a republic and require of public officials a faithful performance of the duties entrusted to them as servants of the people.

Its third duty is to protect its readers, insofar as may be reasonably possible, from evil influences in public life and from dishonest or misguided persons who through its own advertising columns might seek to mislead or exploit its innocent readers.

Lastly, its duty is to itself, its owners or stockholders—for unless a fair return on their investment is yielded, the publication must cease and, with it, its opportunity to perform any service to the public.

In furtherance of these duties we hold these principles to be compatible with both high editorial and news ideals and sound business conduct of a successful, prosperous and useful newspaper:

1. Fairness to its subscribers, its advertisers, to the public at large and to its competitors. Recognizing that honest differences of opinion exist among all people, intelligent or otherwise, we should not impute dishonest motives or unfair conduct to any person or any competitor until ample proof is available; until that time we may honestly differ and vigorously maintain our own opinions, but should not denounce others as dishonest.

2. Decency should be the guiding star in the printing news, editorials, advertising and all feature articles or illustrations. Even though at time pruriency, morbidness and a desire for sensationalism may seem to be in demand by a considerable element of the reading public, it is a newspaper's duty to keep its own columns decent and thus strive to hold steady the public mind in the path of right, morality and the service of God. "Is fit to print and to be read by my own mother, wife or daughter" should be the test, rather than "will it sell more papers."

3. Consideration for the unfortunate and for the guiltless victims of the faults of others. Though, knowing that publicity is the greatest deterrent of crime, we must expose fearlessly and without favor the name of law-breakers, we should protect the names of the innocent members of their families.

4. Respect and tolerance for those of different religions, races and circumstances of life. Ridicule may bring only pain to them, but its author cannot escape real injury in loss of the respect in which he is held by the public, if not by himself.

5. Honesty in our dealings with our readers, our advertisers, our employes, our competitors and all with whom we do business; to give a dollar's value for every dollar received and to pay a dollar for every dollar's worth of service. We should do no less and should not be expected to do more.

6. First, last and always, to be truthful to the limit of our ability; to be as accurate as human fallibility on the part of others as well as of ourselves will permit; to willingly mislead none and to be fair to all.

Though temporary prosperity may be achieved by violation of some of these ideals, we conceive it to be our duty to hold steadfast to these principles, and we believe permanent success will reward them.

Marco Morrow, of the Capper Publi:ations, then went to the platform on be:alf of Stanley Clague, managing direc:or of the Audit Bureau of Circulations. Speaking as a publisher and a director of the A. B. C., he outlined briefly how he A. B. C. had benefited the whole ad:ertising structure and that not the least of its benefits was in showing its pub:isher members the weak spots in their own and their competitor's circulation.

George D. Lindsay, publisher Marion (Ind.) Chronicle-Herald and president nland Daily Press Association, presented he greetings of the latter to its sister egional association and also an invitation or a joint meeting of the organizations o be held at West Baden Springs, Ind., ext year.

H. Galt Braxton, publisher Kinston 'ree Press and president of the North Carolina Press Association, welcomed the . N. P. A. back to North Carolina and escribed the many places in the Western art of the state suitable for the annual ssembly of Southern newspaper men in ddition to the beauty spot at Asheville.

Josephus Daniels, publisher Raleigh ews & Observer, scheduled for a Fourth f July oration, telegraphed his regrets om New York, where the Democratic onvention was holding him, and gave lace to Major Clark Howell, Jr., tlanta Constitution, who deprecated the lea of Independence Day orations and roceeded to deliver a good one.

Morton Caldwell, of the Chambers Agency, Inc., New Orleans, expressed his gratification that his agency had been chosen to prepare and place the advertising of the association and described in a five-minute address some plans he and his fellow members of the American Association of Advertising Agencies have for the gathering and distribution of market and circulation information. Greater details are to be found in another column.

One of the bright features of the convention came next in an address by John A. Davis, editor Albany (Ga.) Herald, on how his newspaper had induced the farmers to combat the depredations of the boll weevil in the Herald's territory. The county cotton crop in normal years is 20,000 bales, he said, and had been reduced in 1923 to 5,000 bales. The farmers were in hard straits and thoroughly disheartened. Nevertheless, agricultural experts had declared that another dusting of calcium arsenate in 1923 would have saved a good proportion of the crop, and Mr. Davis determined that the effort would be made this year.

The farmers were skeptical as to the value of any remedy against the dreaded pest and inclined to let nature take its course. Three problems therefore presented themselves to Mr. Davis:

1. The proper method of controlling the boll weevil.

2. Informing the farmers of this method.

3. Restoring the farmers' confidence.

A meeting was called of country agricultural experts and others proficient in Southern farm problems and a circular was sent out signed by these men telling the farmer what to do and how to do it.

†††Government Statement, April 1, 1924.

That disposed of problem one and part of problem two. The Herald then attacked the rest by a campaign against the boll weevil. A red line was carried across the top of page one every day for several weeks to the effect that "Southern Georgia Must Lick the Boll Weevil." It was hammered and hammered and hammered home to the farmers.

Then the Chamber of Commerce was induced to carry a large advertisement in two colors for the better part of a week, amplifying and emphasizing the message; for, of course, the business men were hit as hard as the farmers by the loss of the crop.

Next, the Herald went to leading business men—mostly non-advertisers, like banks, wholesale distributors, etc.—and induced them to use the two-color advertisements to clinch the argument. Editorials and interviews carried appeals from local leaders of all lines of work.

Success has apparently crowned the effort, as a recent survey shows that 87 per cent of the farmers have adopted the methods suggested. The boll weevil is present in smaller numbers than at any time since the beginning of the infestation several years ago and the outlook for a good crop is brighter than at any time since 1920. And, incidentally, the Herald is richer by $2,000, brought to the till by the special advertising.

Col. Ewing, Col. Clark Howell and F. G. Bell testified in succession to the excellent public service being rendered by Mr. Davis to his community. Col. Ewing told how northern Louisiana had combatted the weevil by forcing the cotton crop to maturity before the beetle reached its most destructive stage each season. Col. Howell declared that the weevil had been really a blessing to the South. It had taught the farmers what the editors had written in vain for twenty years—the need for diversification of crops.

Election of officers was next on the program and was concluded after a brief discussion in which all but members of the association were excluded from the meeting. As stated, Arthur Newmyer was re-elected president and Mr. Johnson had already been named secretary-treasurer.

Under the new by-laws there is no chairman of the board, his functions being exercised by the president. Directors for the various states were re-elected as follows:

SUMTER GILLESPIE'S BRIEF CODE

SUMTER GILLESPIE, editor and publisher of the Greenwood (Miss.) Daily Commonwealth, and president of the Mississippi Press Association, submitted for the consideration of S. N. P. A. members a statement for the code of ethics which most newspapers practice as follows:

"Article 1—We insist upon honesty in news, advertising, and editorial utterances, and will endeavor to protect the public from unfair practices and dishonest advertising.

"Article 2—We are business men and ambitious to succeed, but we are first ethical men and wish no success that is not founded on the highest ethical basis, with due consideration for our employes, the public and our patrons.

"Article 3—Our desire is to improve ourselves, increase our efficiency and enlarge our service, which can be done as an association only so far as each member will clean his own house, discourage unfair practices, fully realizing that we as an association cannot function properly without recognizing our full duty and high moral obligation to the public. We feel that our efforts, if exerted entirely for self, and without consideration for the good of others will defeat wholly the object of our organization.

"Article 4—We believe that by endeavoring to elevate the standards of the vocation in which we are engaged and by meeting together each year for discussion of fundamental principles we will be enabled to so conduct our affairs that our business activities will be more pleasant and profitable than would be otherwise possible, therefore we heartily subscribe to this code of ethics."

Committees were appointed to carry on the association's work as follows:

Advertising—Edgar M. Foster, Nashville Banner, chairman; Victor H. Hanson, Birmingham News; Clark Howell, Jr., Atlanta Constitution, vice-chairman.

Labor—F. C. Withers, Columbia State, chairman; E. K. Gaylord, Oklahoma City Oklahoman, vice-chairman.

Printing School—F. G. Bell, Savannah News, chairman; G. J. Palmer, Houston Post, vice-chairman; Major Allen Potts, Richmond News-Leader.

Legislative—Col. Robert Ewing, New Orleans States, chairman; Major E. B. Stahlman, Nashville Banner, vice-chairman; Urey Woodson, Owensboro Inquirer; M. E. Foster, Houston Chronicle; and H. Galt Braxton, Kinston Free Press.

Editorial Affairs—Wiley L. Morgan, Knoxville Sentinel, chairman; George R. Koester, Greenville Piedmont, vice-chairman.

Press Rates on Telephone Calls—Wiley L. Morgan, chairman; L. K. Nicholson, New Orleans Times-Picayune; John Brice, Atlanta Journal.

George E. Hosmer, Fort Myers (Fla.) Press, and a former president of the National Editorial Association, on Saturday morning stated that Charles D. Haines, former New York Congressman, had offered the Florida Press Association approximately $250,000 worth of property for the establishment of a newspaperman's home in Florida, including $150,000 in dividend-producing stock, $10,000 in cash, and 45 acres of land at Altamonte Springs, Fla. The project is to come before the Florida Press Association this week and Mr. Hosmer invited the support of the S. N. P. A. for the project. The S. N. P. A. voted to promote the plan in their bulletin and to give it their moral support.

D. B. G. Rose, familiar figure at circulation men's gatherings and one of the largest printers in the South, called for more intelligent co-operation between the newspapers and job printers of the South in obtaining men for their establishments and in maintaining proper control over their mechanical forces. He commended the printers' school plan as an excellent step in the right direction.

Wiley L. Morgan reported on efforts to secure a press rate for newspapers using the long distance telephone lines. Mail transmission of news was obviously too slow and the inefficiency of many small-town telegraph operators made the filing of important news over their keys a risky business. Conference with telephone company officials elicited the information that long-distance telephone lines do not need to give any reduction to the press to keep their lines busy, as they are already overburdened, especially at night, with low-rate commercial and social calls.

Mr. Morgan urged that newspapers develop the station-to-station call plan, rather than the person-to-person call, with the correspondent prepaying the call and settling with the newspaper when his news account was submitted for payment. Twenty per cent in tolls could be saved by this, he said.

He urged that a committee be named for further discussion of the press rate proposal with the telephone company, and the chair named Messrs. Morgan, Nicholson and Brice, as told above, with instructions to report to the 1925 convention.

Mr. Morgan's esteemed rival from Knoxville, W. M. Clements, Journal and Tribune, took the floor next with his proposed code of ethics, which, with another submitted by Sumter Gillespie, Greenwood (Miss.) Commonwealth, appear elsewhere in this issue.

General approval followed Mr. Clements' address, but the convention expressed a desire for leisurely action in adoption of a code. W. T. Anderson, of Macon, called attention to a code of principles prepared by his predecessor on the Macon Telegraph and printed originally in EDITOR & PUBLISHER many years ago. Mr. Anderson asked the committee to consider these principles in formulating a code. It was not desired by the convention, with all its intention to avoid haste, to postpone the promulgation of the code for another year, so President Newmyer solved the difficulty by getting the association to vote that it wanted a code, that it was satisfied to turn the matter to a committee appointed by the chair which would report to the board of directors and await the latter's action. The committee appointed by the chair, under the chairmanship of Mr. Clements, was the entire board of directors.

Debate on future meeting places brought up again the old subject of meeting in various cities. Clark Howell, Jr., presented an invitation from the city of Atlanta, which glistened with the brilliant words of a Southern host.

"But, no thank you, Atlanta," was the association verdict. Mr. Anderson forgot state pride long enough to remind the convention that the average temperature of 61 degrees mentioned in the Atlanta invitation included about 49 degrees below zero in winter and that extra collars and ability to perspire freely were valuable assets for summer conventioners in Atlanta. He moved that the association decide not to resume its city-to-city wanderings of ten years ago and that a permanent meeting place be decided upon.

Mr. Lindsay's invitation to West Baden Springs embarrassed the courteous gentlemen of Dixie. Some of them liked the idea, others didn't, but didn't like to say so with the inland president in their midst. Finally, it was definitely decided to stay in the South and to let the board of directors choose the next meeting place, and unofficial advices are that Asheville again rules favorite.

In the golf tournament, which was held Thursday afternoon, forty members and guests competed.

G. H. Gunst, E. Katz Special Agency, with the low net score of 68, captured the prize offered by President Newmyer, a suit of Biltmore Homespun.

Charles P. Eddy, with a score of 85, won the travelers' clock, presented by the Mergenthaler Linotype Company, for the low gross score. John Budd was second, with a score of 86, and captured a silver cigar case with ash trays to match, presented by the E. W. Blatchford Company. Morton Caldwell, who also turned in a score of 86, was presented with a silk umbrella by the Magnetic Player Board Company.

George P. Lindsay, president of the Inland Daily Press Association, who was second with a net score of 70, won a leather golf bag presented by EDITOR & PUBLISHER. G. C. Willings tied for third place with E. R. Wheatley, and the former won an inkstand offered by John Budd, and the latter a cigarette case offered by the Intertype Corporation.

G. J. Palmer, Houston Post, turned in the high gross score, 145, which was labeled the worst, and won a percolator offered by the Cline Electric Company.

L. K. Nicholson, New Orleans Times-Picayune, won the golf bag offered by the Imperial Type Metal Company for the worst net score, with a score of 105. The first "Kickers prize" went to F. W. Bott, Mergenthaler Linotype Company, who, with a score of 76, won the golf vase offered by the Cutler-Hammer Company.

Fred P. Motz, John Branham Company, won a leather traveling bag as second prize with the same score. It was necessary for them to draw.

F. W. Schnell, Cutler-Hammer Company, won a sweater offered by the Miller Saw Trimmer Company as the third "Kickers prize."

BLUE RIDGE BREEZES

IT was Mr. Johnson's reference to "Chattanooga's 1,800 diversified industries" in presenting the gavel to Mr. Newmyer that drew a booming "I object" from W. T. Anderson, citizen of Macon, Ga.

AND it was this same W. T. Anderson who was warned by fellow members that the speed cops would get him if he didn't watch out. That was after he told casually of driving the 400-odd miles from Macon to Asheville between dawn and dusk and his plaint that the car isn't as comfortable as his old one when hitting along at 50 per hour.

H. R. DWIRE, editor of the Winston-Salem Sentinel, was a silent and attentive listener to all discussions. He has been editing Southern newspapers for a score of years and outside the convention revealed a fund of newspaper stories.

H. CHARLTON WRIGHT, editor of the Columbia (S. C.) Record, was so tickled by complimentary reference to the number of "Flashes" he lands in EDITOR & PUBLISHER every week that he treated the correspondent to a suit of Biltmore homespun. Mr. and Mrs. Wright drove from Columbia in their new Cadillac.

MRS. JOHNSON and the other ladies of the convention received special notice from F. L. Seely, the former Atlanta publisher who likes to entertain newspaper men at Grove Park Inn. Mr. Seely presented each lady with a suit of Biltmore homespun, made on the grounds of wool taken from the Inn's sheep-fold.

ONE of the convention's sideshows was the battle of the electioneers in the Baltimore Evening Sun-Baltimore News fight over the former's application for Associated Press membership. The Hearst interests were represented by J. Thomas Lyons, Baltimore News; A. B. Chivers, and James B. Nevin, Atlanta Georgian. The Baltimore Evening Sun merits were argued by J. K. Blondell, auditor of the A. S. Abell Company. The matter did not come before the convention, of course.

IF we do say it, as shouldn't, all golfers' eyes were turned toward the Spalding leather golf bag given by EDITOR & PUBLISHER, won by Mr. Lindsay, of Marion, Ind., and dubbed by President Newmyer the "best prize of the tournament." Newmyer wanted to carry it back to New Orleans, but was the only member of his foursome to come away empty-handed. Two of them won the prizes for worst scores and the genial president wound up one stroke too many to carry off the desired trophy.

WESTERN North Carolina had an able advocate in H. Galt Braxton, who, strangely enough, edits his Free Press 400 miles away from Asheville in Kinston. He fought a hard and successful fight to keep the convention for his adopted state.

IOWA—

Iowa has over 219,000 farms. The average size of each is about 160 acres, and the value of these farms and property thereon is over Eight and a Half Billion Dollars.

That is seven times the value of the farms in the six New England States and twice the value of the famous orchards and farms of the three Pacific States.

The people of Iowa have more wealth per capita than the people of any other state in the Union. The per capita wealth for Iowa is $3,539. Nearly twice that of the United States as a whole.

There are two bank accounts in Iowa for every five men, children and women, which shows the even distribution of money among all the people, increasing your percentage of potential consumers.

Iowa has the second largest ratio of automobiles per capita among the States, the farmer owned prevailing.

Iowa leads all States in literacy. Only 1.1 per cent are illiterate. The State has a large percentage of native born whites, 89.8.

A State offering such a great potential market should be the first choice of every National Advertiser.

BUSINESS TICKLERS

FOLKS in your city are being turned loose from offices for summer holidays these days.

Double truck ad built by several different stores might run under the caption:

"What do you need for your holiday?

Suitcases
Bathing Suits
Camping outfits
Hiking shoes
Tennis shoes
Golf sticks and bags
Tennis racquets
Women buy furs in summer.

It's an old idea, but how about selling it all over again to your local department store; something along this line:

"We're Equipped to Help You Make that Summer Dress"

Display:
Ginghams
Voiles
Silks, patterns,
Threads, etc.

NOW is the time for the automobile dealers to get busy in lining up closed car prospects for the fall. The newspaper can co-operate with the dealers in doing this by getting the dealers to run ads in which they would have coupons which could be cut out and filled in by people—these coupons stating that the signers were interested in closed cars for the fall. These coupons could then be mailed in by the signers to the auto dealers. This plan would get the dealers to use more advertising than they had planned to use during the summer months. —Frank H. Williams, 1920 Spy Run avenue, Fort Wayne, Ind.

"What I Saw and Heard Around Town," by Peggy Pence was a full page ad caption in a Dubuque paper. There were 16 ads and were woven about personal trips to the stores. The descriptions of merchandise were personal and catchy.—L. J. Jellison, Times Journal, Dubuque, Ia.

Where to park downtown. Stop smashing each other's fenders and tail lights. Park with us. Enjoy the convenience—Save money, time and police notices. Under this heading, a middle west paper prints garage cards. This can be run as display or in the classified columns.—George C. Marcley, Republican-Journal, Ogdensburg, N. Y.

Run a little corner under the heading "What Is Your Favorite Daily ——— Feature and Why?" Publish one of the answers each day. You will not only feel out your readers on which of your features are winners and direct you as to what class of features to buy, but will also create a lot of personal interest and will be a feature in itself which readers will scan the paper for each day.—Ehu Ghbert, Chicago.

A six-column advertisement used recently by Cheasty's clothing store, Seattle, Wash., made use of a column of clothing "news" items. Headed with three paragraphs on the business value of a good appearance, over the signature of Ray E. Bigelow, manager of the store.—L. J. Jellison, Times Journal, Dubuque, Ia.

The Fort Wayne (Ind.) newspapers recently co-operated with the local merchants with great success in putting on two "Better Business Days" on a Wednesday and Thursday on which all of the merchants of the city offered special bargains and for which they used extra advertising space in the local papers. The newspapers' contribution to the success of the event was the donation of quite a considerable amount of advertising space in which appeared snappy copy telling about Fort Wayne's recent splendid business achievements and particularly rosy outlook for the future. Undoubtedly other papers could do the same sort of thing with equally good results.—Frank H. Williams, 1920 Spy Run avenue, Fort Wayne, Ind.

By utilizing a caption such as "Vacation Companions," an opportunity is afforded to group a number of retail merchants in your town who will contribute personal and constantly used articles of great variety which are useful companions to the vacationist.—C. M. Littlejohn, Washington, D. C.

We are running a front page feature which has proven a good will creator for the publication. While soliciting advertising, we have opportunities to talk with business men about items of interest and get their opinions. Each week, under the head, "John Jones Says" (mentioning the advertiser's name) we run fifteen or twenty lines giving the merchant's opinion on a certain subject. This is enclosed in a box. The advertiser likes to see his name on the front page and the people always read it.—Donald O. Ross, Washington (Iowa) Democrat.

Under the title: "Which are you?" San Antonio Express featured a double page spread recently, that boosted San Antonio manufactured articles. The news item that followed the title was a conversation between Mr. Detrimental Citizen, a man who sends most of his money out of the city for things he has to buy, and Mr. City Builder, who shops at home, buying home-manufactured articles as far as possible. The title: "Which are you?" was aimed at the reader.—A. W. Roe, Box 182, San Antonio, Texas.

What filling stations in the paper's city are handling tires and accessories in addition to gasoline? It would be a simple matter to get all such filling stations to come in on a page of ads which had a heading urging all motorists to buy ALL of their wants—such as gasoline, oil, tires and accessories—from the filling stations listed on the page.—Frank H. Williams, 1920 Spy Run avenue, Fort Wayne, Ind.

CASH FOR CLASSIFIED

Peterborough Newspaper Collects Ads by Circulation Cars

To overcome the universally difficult problem of collecting for classified advertising, and also the clerical detail involved in posting such business in the account books, Peterborough Examiner, of Peterborough, Ontario, advertises that it will call for classified advertising and collect for it at the same time.

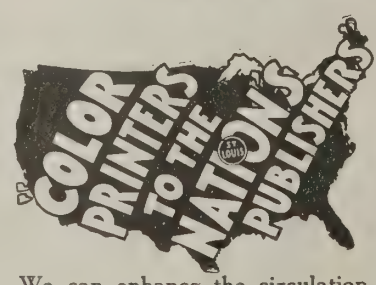
That newspaper does not insert classified advertising unless it is paid in advance. Only a few exceptions are made to this rule and in such cases a double charge is made to cover the cost of collecting and posting.

Addressing EDITOR & PUBLISHER the management of the Examiner says:

"We find it cheaper to send for the copy and collect at the same time, by one of our circulation delivery cars, than to get the advertising charged up and endeavor to collect it afterwards. A large percentage of classified advertising is received over the counter in our office."

In a catchy little illustrated ad on page 1, the Examiner advertises as follows: "Use a Want Ad! If convenient for you, call at the Examiner office, or 'phone 1600 and we will call for the advertisement and give you the cash rate. All orders in before noon, to be called for, will appear same day."

Prize for Slogan



The Nursey industry of Newark, N. Y., working through The Courier, of that town, has offered a prize of $100 in gold for the best slogan to advertise Newark, New York, as the home of nursery stock. The competition is open to everyone, and any number of slogans may be submitted by one person. All slogans submitted must include "Newark, New York." The contest ends Monday, Sept. 1, 1924. All slogans should be mailed to "Slogan Contest Editor, The Courier, Newark, N. Y."

A.A.A.A. PLANS MARKET RESEARCH BUREAU

Plans Nebulous, Headquarters States, Refusing Details of President Resor's Idea—Eductaor to Direct Work

Preliminary plans are being discussed by American Association of Advertising Agencies directors looking forward to possible formation of a market or circulation investigation bureau, EDITOR & PUBLISHER learned this week.

At headquarters officials declined to make any statement regarding these plans, declaring they were as yet too indefinite. Stanley Resor of the J. Walter Thompson Company, president of the A. A. A. A., is originator of the idea, and its development is awaiting Resor's return from the international convention of the A. A. C. W. in London.

It is understood the proposed bureau may concern itself with an investigation of "quality circulation" in a similar capacity as that now performed by the Audit Bureau of Circulations in its reports on quantity circulation.

While it was stated at the A. A. A. A. headquarters that no one has yet been selected to head the proposed bureau, EDITOR & PUBLISHER is informed it will be conducted by a prominent educator now connected with a large Eastern university.

CLEVELAND NEWS MAY MOVE

Considering a Home in Less Crowded Section, But Plans Are Not Final

The Cleveland News and Sunday News-Leader may leave the present quarters in the congested section at Superior avenue and East Sixth street.

Some time ago the company acquired a large vacant lot at East 18th street and Superior avenue, a less congested section, but centrally located for making quick distribution to downtown corners. On this lot a publishing plant will probably be erected, but George F. Moran, general manager, states that the plans have not been settled. Whether the building, if erected, will be a skyscraper is also uncertain.

At the same time there is talk of moving the advertising and other offices of the two papers, now in the Leader-News building, where the papers are published, to the Hanna building, at East 14th street and Euclid avenue, erected by the late Dan R. Hanna as a monument to his father, the late M. A. Hanna.

Prices Cut in Oklahoma

Simultaneous reductions in the price of street sale and news stand copies have been announced by the Oklahoma News and Oklahoma City Times. The Times reduced from three cents to two, the News from two cents to one. In both instances, the new prices are those which prevailed prior to the war.

Cleveland's 4

Depend on Imperial

CLEVELAND'S four big newspapers are leading factors in the lives of the Fifth City's citizens. Always standing for that which they believe best, these papers have played a most vital part in making Cleveland one of America's finest cities.

It is significant that Cleveland's big four should all see fit to depend upon the product and services of the Imperial Type Metal Company. Naturally we feel complimented on the reliance placed in Imperial Metal.

Cleveland's Four are not an exception in their selection. Publishers in many other leading cities are likewise depending upon the Imperial Plan. Nor is the Plan confined to larger papers. Village weeklies and semi-weeklies are also turning to the Imperial Plan.

Find Out Why!

Why are publishers adopting the Imperial Metal Plan? That question can best be answered by reading the Plan itself. Write and let us show you how this dependable, economical and stable Plan will add years of service to your metal and assure you against metal troubles.

DEATH OF J. M. DOVE, MONOTYPE PRESIDENT

Worked for 32 Years to Make Composing Machine Commercially Profitable—Man of Energy, Conscience and Vision

J. Maury Dove, for 32 years president of the Lanston Monotype Machine Co., Philadelphia, died at his home in Washington, June 26 after a lingering illness.

Surviving him are his wife, a daughter, Mary Carter Dove, and three sons, J. Maury Dove, Jr., Robert Carter Dove, and Edward Stellwagen Dove.

Mr. Dove was 69 years old. He was one of the best known and most respected residents of the District of Columbia and took an active part in all movements for civic betterment and was favorably known for his benefactions.

He was an indefatigable worker, controlled personally the destiny of the Lanston Monotype Machine Company, the greatest monument to his memory, and also owned a large coal business in Washington and was owner of the Shoreham Hotel.

His first job was to represent a Philadelphia book concern in Washington. He became clerk for a coal company there, and four years later went into a partnership with his employer, the following year becoming owner of the business. From that time forward his rise was rapid.

In the early nineties the Monotype Company was struggling to make the dream of Talbert Lanston come true; to perfect his single-type composing machine so that it would be a profitable proposition. At the solicitation of stockholders, the young coal merchant, J. Maury Dove, was persuaded to take the presidency of the Monotype Company. From that day he was active as its president and guiding genius.

It was through his energy that the machine was perfected until it became internationally known. He it was who fixed the company's policy that every improvement for the Monotype machine was to fit all existing machines. He was thus a pioneer in the policy of protecting the customer from obsolete models.

Much could be written about the personal characteristics of Mr. Dove—his fighting spirit, his fair attitude toward his own business associates, his love for his family, steady ambition, iron will, and complete understanding of financial and market conditions, his intense love of truth, and his hatred of red tape. The Monotype factory of Philadelphia was closed from the morning of his death until the following Monday.

"Like so many other American business men, Mr. Dove gave all of his time to business and none to recreation. In forty years he never took a vacation, and at any time, day or night, was always available for direction and assistance to the department heads and employees of the company. I wish the industry could have known Mr. Dove as I have known him and could have appreciated as I have that in making the Monotype his chief life work he was pursuing an ideal rather than financial gain. In other lines of business he could have made a great deal more money, but he loved the Monotype and his greatest pride was in its achievements."

FERNALD'S EXCHANGE, INC.
THIRD NAT'L B'LD'G., SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

Are You Capable of Business Managing a Daily and Sunday Newspaper?

A Publisher of a progressive newspaper located in the Middle West in a city of about 300,000 wants a thoroughly capable man, whose years of experience have fitted him for the responsible position of increasing the value of an already successful newspaper, as its Business Manager.

If I could describe the man I want, would say he would be forceful, of pleasing personality and well posted on production costs.

He will be required to have and to execute ideas in promotional work in both the Advertising and Circulation Departments.

He must know Finance and Service, and be able to co-operate and co-ordinate with a well developed staff of men in each department. He must be a natural leader, and not a follower.

If your qualifications come up to these standards of requirements, address B-584, Editor & Publisher.

A* Man — or The Man?

It's easy to find a man for a vacant position—but it's generally something else again to locate the man for the place.

It generally is—that is—unless you let an EDITOR & PUBLISHER "Help Wanted" ad do the locating for you.

But with one of these ads in your favor—the man is found in the easiest and most satisfactory way!

HUNCHES

One Dollar Will Be Paid for Each "Hunch" published.

"WHAT was the most unique, the largest and smallest wedding fee you ever received? Ask your ministers this question and publish the replies. This is good copy for any day."—Phil J. Reilly, Rockwood (Tenn.) Chamber of Commerce.

Co-operative marketing has become the cry of the day among producers of all kinds. Chances are there is an A-1 co-operative story somewhere under your nose. Assign a man to get the unbiased facts pro and con and outline what other co-operatives are doing elsewhere. A story which handles the exact situation fearlessly and without bias is certain to win respect.—James M. Mosely, 39 East Concord St., Boston.

"What's Doing in Politics" will make an interest feature for your paper from now until the primaries and even to the election next fall. Make it locally as much as possible.—Lewis Hyman, Pharos-Tribune, Logansport, Indiana.

An interesting and instructive story can be obtained from your court officers regarding the activities of people as they are taking the oath to be a witness. Why do some people raise their left instead of their right hand? Are there any cases when the left hand should be raised? How about persons having both hands off? Do they ever swear people in as witnesses while they are seated? These are a few of the questions that might be asked and answered. A description and explanation of the proper position to take while taking an oath should be included in this story.—Lewis Hyman, Pharos-Tribune, Logansport, Indiana.

Parties of young people and old folks alike very often wind up with some kind of fortune telling stunt. It might be by coffee grounds, tea grounds, palmistry, cards, or any one of a dozen other methods. Why not prepare a series of stories on the various systems of telling fortunes, getting the information from local amateurs. It will prove highly interesting to the women readers.—W. Mark Miller, 1809 Ogden Ave., Superior, Wis.

Interview ice cream manufacturers and dealers, confectioners, etc. Find out how sales fluctuate with weather conditions. Is there much demand in the winter? Is the consumption of ice cream increasing each year and what are the reasons for it? What has been the effect of prohibition on the demand for ice cream? What flavors are most popularly demanded? What are favorite ice cream dishes? Such questions as these should suggest that a good story can be worked up about this popular summer delicacy.—G. C. Biggar, Illinois Agricultural Ass'n., 608 S. Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

"Everyone complains about the weather, but no one ever does anything about it," some sage remarked—but just the same, it is a topic of absorbing interest to the great majority of newspaper readers. It will pay any paper to keep in close touch with the local weather forecaster, and the result will often be a story of unusual interest that could be obtained in no other way. Telling the weather in advance is no dry-as-dust occupation—the modern day science of meteorology ranks with the romantic callings, and there are few of them left in the advancing age of precision machinery. Cultivation of the Weather Man's acquaintance by some member of your city staff will be repaid, if that scribe is discerning, by many a feature article—reminiscent or informative—that will be read far more closely than the routine news report of the day. —J. J. S., Boston, Mass.

The passion for invention is strong everywhere—and no city with an established daily newspaper but has its quota who are exemplars of the adage that "hope springs eternal in the human breast." Get the embryo inventors of your city to discuss their inventions—past, present or prospective—and, in the process, ask them to state for your readers what new things are most needed. You will unearth some queer characters, and hear some weird tales, but good stories are bound to result if the right reporter—preferably a woman—is given the assignment. One of the best stories a Central Massachusetts daily ever printed was an account of the formation of an inventor's protective society, to the organization meeting of which the reporter gained admission as a fellow inventor, deeply interested in the project. —C. L. Moody, Lynn, Mass. Telegram-News.

DISCUSS WIRE PRINTERS

A. P. Michigan Members May Want Them on Auxiliary Lines

Plans for increasing Associated Press Service to Michigan member newspapers were made at the semi-annual meeting of Michigan Associated Press Editors' Association at Muskegon June 28 and 29.

The mail service inaugurated by the A. P. to Michigan members has proved a success, according to David J. Wilkie, correspondent. The service distributed during the 12 months just closed approximately 475,000 words. In June 133 mail stories were carried. About half the mail service is supplied by the staff correspondents. News of interest to farmers is prepared by the Ann Arbor correspondent, who makes regular trips to the Michigan Agricultural College.

The question of using printers in place of operators on the auxiliary wires was discussed and the A. P. traffic department is to furnish data. Some of the papers operate three-hour auxiliary wires and owing to the short trick difficulty is encountered in obtaining a competent operator. The members expressed themselves as opposed to the printer on the general state wire of 18 points.

The next meeting will be held at Ann Arbor in November in conjunction with the University of Michigan Press Club. Frank Vanderlip of New York is to be one of the speakers and will talk on the question of whether the newspaper today is fulfilling its mission.

Arthur W. Stace, Grand Rapids Press, declined re-election as president. J. S. Gray, Adrian Telegram, was elected president and A. L. Miller, Battle Creek Enquirer-News, was named vice-president. David J. Wilkie was re-elected secretary. The advisory board is composed of A. E. McCrea, Muskegon Chronicle; Ray S. Foley, Pontiac Press-Gazette, and W. H. Gustin, Bay City Times.

Long Beach Press Will Build

Lease on property on Broadway and Pine avenue which was held by the Long Beach (Cal.) Press and on which they expected to erect a modern building, has been sold by them to the Marine Holding Company. Change in the newspaper's building plans result from its increasing circulation and need for expansion. The property would not permit of building a plant large enough to house the paper. The Press has purchased a quarter block at Pine avenue and 6th street, with 150 feet frontage on each street running to an alley on the north and rear sides. Plans have been drawn up for a new building calling for a 4-story and basement structure devoted exclusively to the Press. The investment in the site and building will represent almost $500,000.

TWO FOR ATWOOD

He Buys Another Weekly and Goes to Utica as Gannett Editor

M. V. Atwood, publisher of the Groton (N. Y.) Journal and Courier and the Weekly Ithacan, has purchased the Trumansburg (N. Y.) Free Press and Sentinel. It was also announced this week that Atwood had resigned as professor of extension teaching at the state college at Ithaca, with which he has been connected since 1918, to become managing editor of the Utica Observer-Dispatch, one of the Gannett newspapers.

Business Progress is Dependent on Advertising

OHIO FIRST

Newspapers Are First in Creating and Sustaining Progress

Ohio is First choice of many national advertisers who appreciate the value of intense cultivation of first grade territory.

Morning, evening and Sunday these Ohio newspapers swing over the State. They leave no section of the State untouched.

Ohio has five per cent of the population of the United States — nearly six million people—more than 80 per cent of the population is native born white.

Ohio leads all other states in the number of large centers, having five cities with a population of 200,000 or over. There are also 21 cities in Ohio with over 25,000 population and each city has its own daily newspaper.

While Ohio's identity is marked by tremendous manufacturing activity, it is well to keep in mind that Ohio's agricultural balance makes Ohio a leading state of the Union.

"Ohio First" newspapers have a local dealer influence and a greater local advertising potentiality than any other advertising medium.

Ohio First newspapers give both QUANTITY of circulation and QUALITY of circulation — a winning combination.

Shrewd National Advertisers insist that their advertising must be kept continuously in the following list of "Ohio First" newspapers.

The Significance of Dominating in Radio Advertising

THE SUN, New York, published 723,588 agate lines—2,400 columns—of Radio advertising in the first half of 1924; a greater volume than any other newspaper.

The Sun carried more Radio advertising in these six months than all other New York evening newspapers combined; more than all New York morning and Sunday newspapers combined; almost half of the Radio advertising carried by the ten New York morning and evening newspapers.

These figures constitute an excellent measure of the breadth of The Sun's large high-quality circulation. For Radio has a universal appeal among all those who can afford it.

Radio has entered the homes of the wealthy. Radio is found particularly in the homes of the prosperous middle classes. Radio is the present chief diversion of the well-paid, skilled mechanic with his genius for "putting things together."

That The Sun thus overwhelmingly dominates in Radio in New York is significant evidence that The Sun is the dominant newspaper among these classes in New York—that The Sun appeals to the intelligent and prosperous of all classes in the world's greatest market.

The more than 250,000 daily purchasers of The Sun constitute the largest circulation of high-class readers attained by any New York evening newspaper.

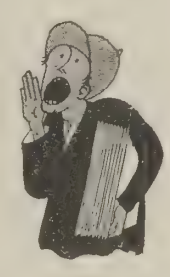
We like our own stuff

MOST of us have met the restaurateur who doesn't like his own grub. As he leaves his eating house to get lunch up the street he is almost certain to stop on the way out to tell some deluded customer how delicious is the ham and cabbage.

When we find a proprietor who eats breakfast, lunch and dinner in his own restaurant, our respect for the food increases considerably. Well, The Chicago Tribune likes its own stuff. In fact no feature is sold by The Chicago Tribune Newspapers Syndicate that does not appear regularly in The Chicago Tribune or The News of New York. Not a dish is offered to our customers that we don't serve first to ourselves.

We call our own newspaper, with perhaps more pride than modesty, the world's greatest. We use these features with the earnest belief that they help to make The Tribune the "world's greatest."



THERE is something in the make-up of the so-called human race that gets a kick out of other people's weaknesses.

In the sardonic humor of W. E. Hill we see our neighbors more often than we see ourselves. So we laugh—and this weekly page has become immensely popular. It always leads Part 2 of the Rotogravure Picture Section in The Chicago Tribune. W. E. Hill's picture page of sarcastic humor is a valuable feature for us and will be for you.

And we believe that most of the publishers who are buying our features have the same pride in the quality of their newspapers as we have in ours. So we neither use, ourselves, nor ask you to buy, imitation stuff—attempted copies of other successes—or any sort of hand-me-downs.

The News of New York and The Chicago Tribune lead the morning daily field in America in circulation (and The News leads all the dailies, morning or evening) not merely because they have the best balanced, most carefully selected and intelligently edited group of features, but because they tell the world they have them.

Please read the following list of features and write or wire for proofs and further information on any of them or all of them.

NO STANDARDIZED INTERTYPE HAS EVER BECOME OBSOLETE

STANDARDIZED BASIC UNIT

COMPLETED TO SUIT BUYER

One Basic Unit

When you buy an Intertype you do not tie up with any one "model" which may become obsolete in a short time. Instead you buy a standardized basic unit, completed to your order with just the equipment that meets your present requirements. Later you can add other units—more standard magazines, or a power keyboard side unit, or any new standardized improvements that may be developed in the future.

The pictures above tell the story. At the left is the standardized basic unit. At the right the machine is shown completed with three main magazines and a power keyboard side unit carrying three side magazines.

Your standardized Intertype never becomes obsolete, for you can always add new units, or new improvements, to keep it up to date.

Shall we send our nearest representative—without obligation on your part? Or do you prefer full details by mail? Write or wire collect.

And the greatest of these is—

¶ The rate book can tell you everything about a newspaper except one thing.

¶ And that thing is—the sort of people who read it.

¶ The Sunpapers are Baltimore. They are as much Baltimore as Mt. Vernon Place and The Shot Tower. They go into Baltimore homes on the basis of an old friend.

¶ Add that fact to the circulation figures—and you will understand.

¶ The Sunpapers are read because they are good newspapers. They are Baltimore newspapers. They have caught that intangible something called "local flavor."

Shoes of the Biggest Man in Philadelphia — The Bulletin Reader

The "big" man in all respects is logically the "biggest buyer."

The maximum market is logically reached by advertising to the "biggest" group.

In Philadelphia the Bulletin dominates in circulation. Talk to the "big reader" if you want to get "big results" in sales.

Besides the intensive covering power, the prestige of association with "size" gives added weight to advertising in the Bulletin.

The Bulletin's circulation is one of the largest in America, and goes daily into more than half-a-million homes in Philadelphia and vicinity.

"In Philadelphia nearly everybody reads The Bulletin"

World Advertising Assembly Sweeps London in Spectacle of Royal Splendor

Week of Unprecedented Social Gaiety and Crowded Business Sessions—Lou Holland and Jesse H. Neal Honored by Re-election—Magnificent Reception of U. S. Delegations—"Houston, Texas, Next"

By HERBERT C. RIDOUT and JAMES W. BROWN
(Cabled to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

LONDON, July 17.—America glorious in the Olympic games and the round-the-world army airplane flights shared a third triumph on Old World soil with Great Britain in the International Advertising Convention of the Associated Advertising Club of the World held on the British Empire Exposition Grounds near London this week. Two thousand delegates from the United States and Canada were engulfed from the moment of their landing in a tidal wave of hospitality that has left them breathless and wondering what this supposedly staid old nation still has in store for them.

"God help the city that gets the convention next year and tries to compete," ejaculated one of the Yankees.

And they put that job up to Houston, Tex., as everybody had expected after the magnanimous action of the Texans in giving way to Britain last year and after the magnificent bid that Houston made for the 1925 meeting in EDITOR & PUBLISHER a few weeks ago. Atlanta, Ga., had its name on the lips of delegates for a few moments early in the week but withdrew in favor of Houston before the dinner of the club presidents at the Piccadilly Hotel Tuesday evening. Houston's choice at the dinner was unanimously ratified by the convention this afternoon.

So also was the re-election of Lou E. Holland of Kansas City for a third term as president of the A. A. C. W.—an honor unprecedented in the history of that organization. Mr. Holland had no determined opposition. The impression of sincerity, candor and ability that he left with the British delegates who saw him at Atlantic City last year was passed to and accepted by the affiliated clubs of Europe. The North American delegates needed no further testimonial of Mr. Holland's right to a third term than the broadened scope and the increase in public respect that has come to the A. A. C. W. under the two years of his administration.

Jesse H. Neal, of New York, who has been Mr. Holland's associate for the past two years, was also given another term as secretary-treasurer. Both nominations were made unanimously by the joint assembly Tuesday and confirmed without a dissenting vote today by the convention.

And besides these happy endings, which are of interest primarily to Americans, was the "bloodless revolution" pictured by Harry Tipper of New York at the convention banquet given immediately after his arrival, several days before the American armada descended upon Southampton.

London made history in advertising when the hundred British representatives formed a delegation at Atlantic City last year. London put the "world" into the A. A. C. W., and made a thousand friends in the process—friends in something more than name.

Two thousand visitors from the United States alone—the conduct of an advertising convention to satisfy not merely her own folk, but the standardized requirements of A. A. C. W. laws—the height of hospitality lavished upon a hundred British delegates to be matched—the justification of Britain's claim for the convention—these were some of the problems that stared the little knot of British optimists in the face.

London's advertising men certainly struck a good promotion idea in their Tuesday convention luncheons. Throughout the year the initiation of various publicity clubs throughout the country was another effective means of propaganda. Gradually interest was worked up until on Saturday, July 12, a feverheat of tension and expectation had been created. It formed a wave that stretched from the Waterloo terminus of the Southern Railway at London down to the 80-mile-distant Southampton Dock.

At Waterloo a fidgety crowd grew larger every minute. This was the main guard of welcome, and the leaders of the convention—Harold Vernon, John Cheshire, Philip Emanuel, your correspondent, and others of the keener spirits to the number of near a score, were at the shore to see that their American friends made no slip 'twixt ship and dock.

And so that the visitors might not feel too strange, the faces of Harry Tipper, Earle Pearson, A. E. Mackinnon (who looked thoroughly unhappy because a British railway conductor would not allow him to sit upon a pile of baggage), and Herb Palin of Los Angeles, were pushed forward into the front ranks of the welcomers. As night was well advanced when the Republic, Lancastria and Leviathan were berthed, the reception committee went aboard at 6 o'clock the next morning.

A flood of grinning Americans rapidly overwhelmed the welcome party. It looked as though the American invasion had wiped out the Britons, for it was some time before the latter sorted themselves out and became a distinct entity with a self-imposed duty to perform.

Reception—a genial, youthful-looking man in robes and chain—the Mayor of Southampton murmuring pleasant words of formal kind, assuring the visitors from overseas of their first welcome on British soil—introductions, presentations, the signing of mysterious documents, a buzz of conversation and the ceremonial is over. But it should remain long in the minds of those in whose honor it was arranged, for such things are only done for captains and kings of distinction.

Away to London, the corridor coaches of the ten Southern trains permitting fraternization of visitors and hosts to continue as on American railway trains, and the two-hour journey flickered into seconds.

At Waterloo the fidgety crowd settled down to close scrutiny as the Republic train drew in. Harold Vernon was the first to alight and although it is believed that the honor of being the first American in the party to put foot on London ground had been reserved for Lou Holland, something like 200 actually tied for first, and the scramble looked like a party of first-year undergraduates home from college.

But what was this yelling? The Americans had been schooled into the incredible belief that their welcome to London would be signalized by a hush-hush reception in which the only sounds would be the murmur of "How do you do?" "Glad to know you," and the silent handclasp. What then was this vocal tornado that had let loose? Had the Americans forgotten their nice manners and given a college yell or similarly outraged the feelings of the quiet British?

No, sir! This is just the London advertising man forgetting himself and giving a rousing British cheer of welcome because he's so "damned glad to see you boys." The Briton is very human in his unguarded moments.

And it was pretty much all of an hour before Waterloo was clear of American accent, and a fleet of taxis had distributed the Yankees to their hotels—the

MRS. NEAL'S ALLEGORICAL STATUETTE PRESENTED TO BRITISH

British advertisers received with enthusiasm a trophy symbolic of the union of British and American advertising bodies, presented to them by the American delegation. The trophy is a bronze statuette by Grace Pruden Neal, of New York, showing two figures representing Columbia and Brittania, together carrying forward the torch of "Truth in Advertising." The base of the piece is inscribed "Associated Advertising Clubs of the World." The statuette, which was presented by President Holland, will remain the property of the British advertisers, who were the hosts of the convention. The artist, Grace Pruden Neal, is the wife of Jesse H. Neal, secretary-treasurer of the A. A. C. W.

The Royal Albert Hall resembles a mausoleum from whichever side you approach it, and a pretty-pretty globular decoration for a frosted cake when you view it from the air. It is a vast domed building in swell Kensington, with the glorified lollipop monument, the Albert Memorial, at its elbow. It is so old-fashioned that the directorate haven't even a photograph for publication, but it was the largest concert hall in London and for that reason was chosen as the only place likely to accommodate hosts and visitors for the convention reception.

Ten days before, Harold Vernon said he had received some 5,000 requests for tickets, from British folk alone. I think they all got in, as well as the American.

The Pennsylvania banqueting hall on June 1, last year, was a memorable picture, but this Albert Hall scene had it skinned. You enter the auditorium at about man's height from the level, and consequently get a view of the scene that is mightily impressive.

Right ahead in the distance it was possible to discern the features of men like Lord Leverhulme, and John Cheshire, with Lou Holland, Harold Vernon, Sir Charles Higham, Sir Herbert Morgan and W. S. Crawford, holding the higher ground as officers in control of the proceedings. A glance around and the eye loses all sense of focus. A sea of faces, smiles, laughter, but massed beyond recognition. The company is paired, each Briton with an American at his side, and as the vision embraces the scene it would seem that every man had found his brother. The conversation of these 6,000-odd men and women is a deafening din.

The ladies are radiant, their gowns gorgeous. "Peaches" was the term used by an impressionable young "Poor Richard" who had well-nigh forgotten Philadelphia already! Certainly lovely women added a colorsome and fragrant note to the picture. The dancing carnival continued until midnight.

The dance floor, with the platform, was decorated with a representation of the Mayflower. The dancing was interrupted at 9.30 by a procession of the Lord Mayor of London, in state dress, and the provincial mayors, for the reception of the convention officers. It was a wonderful picture of color, dignity and pomp.

The surprise of the evening came when the playing of "God Save the King" announced its end. Its end—yes, but the beginning of 6,000 friendships between men and women who find themselves strangely kinlike—men and women who learned to know each other even better in the week to come.

And so, as Pepys said, home to bed.

Sunday morning, as fair a day as ever dawned. London had been a surprise to our visitors on Saturday, with its ring-around-a-rosy traffic, but today it was a revelation. They had stepped out of their hotels into silent, almost deserted streets. All London's floating population had disappeared and some of our American friends confessed that they almost felt lonely.

But even London on a July Sunday can take on a cloak of picturesqueness—the strong shadows of the hot sun created many bizarre effects with the squat buildings and their varied styles of architecture.

This was the day of the religious festivals of the convention, and though our American friends had complete liberty of action and movement, it is noteworthy that the majority of them elected that their morning duty should be the Westminster Abbey service. High mass also was celebrated at noon in the Roman Catholic Westminster Cathedral.

So well arranged had the hotel accommodation been that all the caravanserai were within reasonable distance of the Abbey and a large number of delegates walked from their hotels.

The low, massive pile that flanks the Houses of Parliament proved an impressive sight to the visitors, their admiration merging into silent veneration as their feet rang upon the paving of the Abbey Cloisters.

Again a scene that will not be easily erased from the memories of those who took part. The ancient building that has been sanctified by centuries of worship and hallowed in English history for 900 years by the coronation of kings and queens—this was the holy place to which two thousand Americans were made welcome. The preacher was the Lord Bishop of Durham, the Rt. Rev. Herbert Hensley Henson, D. D. He took as his text Ephesians iv:25—"Wherefore putting away lying, speak every man truth with his neighbor; for we are members one of another." His sermon was a stirring discourse based on the recognition of advertising as a modern necessity.

But it was not the discourse altogether, or the singing of those fine old English hymns, or the form of service, that took hold of these Americans. It was the profound intimacy of the occasion, the solemnity and restful quiet of the atmosphere.

And then, in the afternoon, though the weather sorely tempted many to the cool, lovely haunts in the upper reaches of the Thames, came the wonderful inspirational meeting in the Central Hall, Westminster—the block facing the Abbey.

That was one point appreciated in our visitors. The call of the open, of the new delights in a strange land, must have been doubly strong in its appeal, but our friends were here on Convention intent, and they stuck to their job with a spirit that must have hit many a Britisher hard with the idea that these fellows meant business and Convention business at that.

The Central Hall was packed. As I imagined, there was a full complement of those who had attended Atlantic City; we knew what to expect.

Organ music by J. A. Meale, a short introductory address by Viscount Burnham, and then Fred B. Smith. His subject was "Advertising and World Good Will."

"Is War Incurable?" was presented to the convention by Mr. Smith as the supreme problem before the human race today.

"Nothing else matters much," he said. "If war is incurable, unpreventable, then every dream you are dreaming and every hope you are cherishing is idle.

"The whole world is swept today by a cry for peace the like of which has not hitherto been known in history, yet all the major nations of the world apparently are getting ready for war some time in the future. The political leaders do not say this. They are loud in declaring that they are all working for peace, yet they go steadily forward promoting policies which, if history means anything and the law of cause and effect still exists, is sure eventually to bring back the same old order.

"We have only to glance at the fact that of the four or five nations most conspicuous in influencing world affairs, every last one of them is in a red-hot, wild, almost insane competition for armament, and even though some of them have participated in conferences organized for the specific purpose of reducing armaments, on they rush toward preparation for war.

NEWSPAPER ADVERTISING PUT U. S. ON WHEELS

"IF the automobile had been invented before the printing press had made the newspaper possible, the fourth largest industry in the world never would have achieved its present proportions," said E. LeRoy Pelletier, advertising manager, Rickenbacker Motor Company. "Not that the automobile manufacturer began to advertise in the daily newspapers as soon as he began to manufacture motor cars," said Mr. Pelletier. "On the contrary, the industry was several years old—though it had not attained to any great proportions—before the first advertising man conceived the idea that the daily newspaper was the medium par excellence for the exploitation of his product.

"This year, fully 80 per cent of the $75,000,000 which will be spent in advertising motor cars, will go into American newspapers, daily and Sunday.

"And this pre-eminence, the newspapers have won against the most deep-seated prejudice, preconceived theories, and the most violent opposition not only of publishers of so-called class media, but of most advertising managers themselves."

RETURNED TO OFFICE

Jesse H. Neal, of New York, re-elected secretary-treasurer of A. A. C. W.

"This leads me to say to you, leader of this great power: the worlds need to be thoroughly, deeply, permanentl alarmed, lest by our indifference we dri back into those same complications whic finally broke out in the horror of 1914 1918.

"Surely we must magnify and continu to magnify yet more the fundament principle of arbitration. This is a Bi lical method handed down and as old a the knowledge of God. Where two me disagree, or a number of men disagre they ought to resort to the appointmer of arbitrators. My own judgment is tha this principle alone, if cultivated and b lieved in, will pretty nearly eliminate th necessity for the roar of guns and th rattle of sabres."

Such was the gist of Mr. Smith's mes sage, during whose delivery the minut hand made a complete circuit of the cloc There was no dogma. He expressed th brotherhood of blood, the friendship c peace, the world-blessing of publicity ap plied to higher things. The magic of h words, the magnetism of his earnestnes the grip of his style—all were there, y it was without apparent strain or effo that Fred B. Smith held his hearers en thralled.

Great Britain has preachers of a hig order. But I think never has an audienc of British business men heard so appeal ing, so thrilling an address as that i which Fred Smith sounded the note c the great 1924 convention.

Sunday evening saw the interests c our visitors divided. Many were draw to the special services organized b Frederick E. Potter at the City Temple Wesley's Chapel, the Central Hall, West minster Chapel, and Kingsway Hal Others seized the advantage of the sum mer-time lengthened evening for rive trips, walks into Hyde Park, etc., whil the principal officers foregathered at th Hotel Cecil as the guests of the Adver tising Association of Houston.

A BOON FOR BUSINESS

"OUT of this meeting I hope we can achieve some ground of common understanding so that when we return to our respective countries, what we read will be interpreted by what we ourselves have learned and I hope further that we will be strengthened in the observance of our responsibilities to the public in the discharge of our duty to business men, so that the work we do will make not only for the good of business, but for the common good and the upbuilding of international stability in all measures.—Harry Tipper, before opening session A. A. C. W.

HE SHOWED 'EM

to get in "fust blow" in the way of convention hospitality, and had invited the London officers and various committee heads to meet them in London tor a special purpose—not divulged.

The special purpose was actually two-fold—one the presentation of silken flags of the United States and of Texas to the Thirty Club. The other was the consumption of real Texas watermelons.

President Patton of the Houston Club proposed the toast "London—1924," recalling the scene at Atlantic City and declaring that the present dinner was a token of appreciation and pleasure. On the presentation of the two flags, Harold Vernon, responding, said that the British had met their hosts as competitors and had left them as dearest friends. He took great pleasure in enrolling President Patton as an honorary member of the Thirty Club. Past President Cheshire of the Thirty Club proposed "Houston—1925" and was supported by Sir Charles Higham, who recalled the Dallas convention of 1912 and the true Southern welcome received there.

The watermelons produced by the Texans created a sensation, Bob Cornell of Houston Chronicle demonstrating how to eat these Dixie face-fillers. One hundred and thirty guests were present.

And then came Monday, the day which 50,000 Britons at least will remember as marking the break of a new epoch in advertising in their own country, and to which, equally, 3,000 or more Americans and other visitors would revert to as a day of days.

The stage was set in the conference hall of the great British Empire Exhibition at Wembley—an aggregation of Imperial wonders and works that outmatches anything in the exposition line since the beginning.

Ten o'clock was the time scheduled for the opening, but a full hour earlier delegates were making their way to Wembley and threading through brilliant greens, gay gardens and devious paths of the exposition grounds. Through the giant Palace of Industry, in which the candy-making plant, the bakery, and a hundred commercial booths were just waking to life. On through the music section, in which strangely enough, the final exhibit is a phonograph as famous on your side as on ours, and a dozen yards bring us to the steps leading into the great Conference Hall. Alongside lies the Palace of Arts, in which is housed the British Advertising Exhibit, but time does not permit of its inspection. The American Advertising Exhibit is in the Stadium Hall, about half a mile distant.

Already, though it is but thirty minutes off schedule time, the Conference Hall is well nigh half-full, and, as actually proved, the steady inflowing stream indicated that the capacity of the building would be taxed to its limits.

This day of all attracts the big crowd, for the genial Prince of Wales, beloved not only of his own people, but of America for his stay among them, had graciously consented to attend the first general session and open the International Advertising Convention in person. The honor was signal, a recognition of a great business movement, a stroke of royal diplomacy in acknowledging an occasion, which had drawn so many American, Dominion, and foreign business men to the heart of the British Empire. The British chairman for the opening session was the Right Hon. the Viscount Burnham, our greatest newspaper proprietor, supported by his excellency the American Ambassador, Frank B. Kellogg, Sir Eric Geddes, Harold Vernon, John Cheshire, Lou Holland, and Harry Tipper.

The Prince of Wales arriverd amid uproarious cheering, putting to shame the sober black of the officers on the dais with his light grey sack suit and all the badges the convention offered. His welcoming speech was enthusiastically received by a great crowd, many of whom stood about at the side of the hall, unable to get seats. The Price remained after his address until practically the end of the session and his frank sincerity made a big hit with all present.

"I am very proud to address this convention," His Royal Highness said. "You show in this assembly that you realize the principle 'Each for all and all for each.' Little as I know about the science and the art of advertising, I appreciate this much—its general aim is to provide throughout the world a more free exchange of commodities and a lower cost of distribution. The attainment of this aim would undoubtedly result in the elimination of unnecessary waste and consequent reduction of prices and unemployment."

Viscount Burnham coined one of the star phrases of the convention when he referred to it as the "greatest rodeo and business round-up in the world." It was not merely an advertisng convention, it was the Rialto of the world's markets. Advertising is a voice speaking to a world that does not know what it wants but won't be happy till it gets it.

Previous to the opening of the meeting, the orchestra enlivened the crowd by playing American and British popular airs. Loud cheers rose from the Texas delegation when "Dixie" was played.

After the Prince's greeting, Ambassador Kellogg welcomed the delegates to England, saying it was well they had come at this time when so many problems, political and social are to be solved.

J. H. Thomas, Secretary of State for the Colonies, added his word of bienvenu, not as representing the Labor Party or any section of the British people, but as the spokesman of the British Government. He tickled the delegates laughter nerves by his assertion that after the Prince of Wales, the Labor Government of Great Britain was the best advertising thing in the country.

President Holland read a brief but inspiring message from President Coolidge, extending his best wishes for the success of the convention and expressing the hope that the "Truth in Advertising" idea would lead to a new understanding between nations.

Mr. Holland expressed the thanks of the American delegation to their hosts. "We all marvelled at the arrangements that have been made," he said. "Nothing like them has ever been seen before."

The president continued with his report that $250,000 was spent last year to teach people more about advertising. The association now numbers over 40,000 members, though now only in its 20th year, and clubs affiliated with it total 313.

Within the last two months, he said, there had been launched in the United States a plan of operation which will make every advertising club a point of contact, a reporting agency through which the National Vigilance Committee and the Better Business Bureaus will be kept informed of the types of promotion and specific companies which may be in operation in any section of the country.

"Never in the history of the Truth-in-Advertising movement has the Vigilance Department handled so many cases involving misrepresentations in advertising as during the last year," said Mr. Holland. "With the development of a Case Department, wherein specific attention is given to specific lines of business, with a staff assigned to the consideration of cases in those different lines, the department is in a position to render a better and more comprehensive service to legitimate business than ever before.

"The movement is known today as a referee of business ethics. It is an outstanding organization, in fact, the only organization equipped and managed to deal specifically; as a non-prejudiced body, with this relation between buyer and seller which if subjected to the undermining influences of deception and fraud results in the impairment of good will which all recognize as the foundation of successful business."

Harry Tipper, of New York, chairman of the general program committee of the convention and one of its guiding spirits since last year, traced the change in the status of advertising men during the past 20 years and said his old aspiration to have an international convention had at last been fulfilled.

"Politicians may not want international co-operation, business may not desire it; but business needs it and people want it," Mr. Tipper said. "As the liaison officer between business and the public, responsible for interpreting one to the other, the advertising man knows the necessity of understanding. If we understand each other's language and business products, if we can rely on each other's business methods, we shall have come a long way toward the kind of understanding which

Milwaukee Printer Tells Convention of Part Accuracy Plans in New Development—Vanderbilt Sees Tabloid As Daily of Future

"ORIGINAL color plates are usually termed the master plates from which the real printing plates are made," L. W. Claybourn told the newspaper executives Thursday. "These printing plates are produced by electrotyping, which is a very old and well-known art. It was not so long ago that grave doubt existed in the minds of the printer or publisher as to the results which could be obtained rom an electrotype, but development has put this problem behind us. Today, nickel steel faced plates are made, molded in lead, which reproduce the most minute detail of any delicately-etched plate, producing a printing plate that has many advantages over even the original from a printing standpoint. This is due mainly to the fact that the plate is more dormant and fits the cylinder or bed more perfectly than would a springy piece of rolled copper, which is the material on which the original plate is etched.

L. W. Claybourn

"The Claybourn Process Corporation of Milwaukee, of which I am president, perfected a method of electrotyping or, rather, a method of perfecting the electrotype. This method involves special precision machinery, plus a method of handling the work throughout that results in a perfect printing plate, which is tested under actual printing conditions and proven to the most minute detail. The finished plate is perfectly uniform in thickness so as to eliminate as nearly as possible all necessity of so-called makeready.

George M. Burbach

"Curved printing plates have been the bugaboo of rotary press printing, especially quality or color printing, as it was extremely difficult to curve a plate the exact diameter of the printing cylinder. The greatest difficulty was that the plate stretched in the process of bending it. With the development of our machinery, however, we have overcome these difficulties, now securing an absolutely non-stretch plate with a perfect arc of curvature, plus a plate that fits the cylinder so perfectly as to become an integral part of it. This not only insures better printing results, but permits of many thousand more impressions from the plate.

"During the process of making these plates they are subjected to treatment which condenses the metal under the solid areas of the printing surface, and makes them unyielding under printing pressures, eliminating the old theory that the solid portion of the plate had to be built up and the delicate or open portion of the plate had to be cut out. This old method was creating a condition that was uncontrollable, causing crystallization and wear.

"When one stops to analyze the delicacy of a half-tone dot and realizes that we are dealing with a total tolerance of two and one-half to three one-thousandths part of an inch, which is the average depth of a halftone dot, we naturally come to the conclusion that we are dealing with something very minutely precise. Therefore, our machinery for making printing plates must be equally accurate and our printing presses upon which these plates are used must be accurate.

"The real mystery of printing, or color printing, today, is in the pressroom where the old methods are still in vogue, and when we gaze upon the beautiful work produced by this old method we cannot help but have a great deal of admiration for the skill of the workmen who produce it. But we are living in a day of production and we have costs to reckon with, and if this same beautiful work can be secured giving us more productive time on our machines and less down time, we have advanced a step forward in solving our problems.

"I do not think that I exaggerate when I say that only 60 per cent of the total time in the pressroom is productive. If just one-half of the 40 per cent could be converted into productive time we would save thousands of dollars per year in the cost of color printing. We have a record of one large color printer whose books show an expenditure for one fiscal year of $313,000 for makeready.

"A large percentage of color printing is accomplished today on the flat-bed press, printing only one color at a time at a speed of about 1,000 sheets per hour. The sheet is permitted to dry about 24 hours, and the second color is put on in like manner. Two-color flat-bed presses, however, are now becoming quite common.

"Rotary or multi-color printing is also coming into prominence and in reality is the field to which we are looking forward to give us production, speed and quality. Sheet-fed rotary presses are today successfully used in high grade magazine and catalog color printing.

"Multi-color inks have played a great part in this development. The compounding of pigments or colors which have an affinity for one another had to be perfected and this was no small contribution to the development of this art; in fact, wet printing is still in its infancy and great improvements are looked for in this direction.

"In printing by this method we are again confronted with tedious long makereadies, taking from one to two weeks to start what we would call a sixteen-page color form. By the use of our new process plate, however, we have overcome this great obstacle and we can now put to press and register a form on a rotary press with almost the same rapidity as that of the flat-bed type of printing press.

"Irrespective of the size of sheet-fed rotary presses and the productive speeds we have thus far obtained, the ever-increasing demand of the publisher and national advertiser has urged us to still further develop the capacity of the sheet-fed rotary press, and we are now developing high-speed rotary web presses which will print four and five colors on one side and two or three on the reverse side, at a speed of about ten thousand per hour, thirty-two pages in color, sixteen pages front and back.

"It must be obvious to those who are following this industry closely that a great amount of new development has been necessary. For instance, referring to the photo-engraver again, he must etch

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE'S MESSAGE

I SHALL be very glad if you will take occasion to express to the delegates attending the convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World my heariest good wishes and cordial greetings. I notice that the emblem of your organization bears the single word "Truth." Just as this word symbolizes the only real basis of friendly relationship between buyer and seller, so in a larger sense it is equally essential in the wider relationships of nation to nation. I am sure that this gathering of business men will lead to that clearer knowledge which will do away with misunderstandings arising from failure to know the truth.—Calvin Coolidge.

LIGHTS O' LONDON

HOUSTON'S alert representatives hope to make the star feature of their convention next year a visit from His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. Negotiations have already started with St. James's Palace, which the delegates hope will be productive after their return to the United States.

HAROLD VERNON, in one of the bright lines with which the convention scintillated, called "advertising the Cinderella of Business" and added that she had been wooed by 'Prince Charming'" following the opening address by the Prince of Wales.

THE special edition of Editor & Publisher of June 21 was much in evidence and congratulations were universal.

FIVE members of the Advertising Club of New York formed the committee to extend the convention's greetings to the American aviators on their arrival at Croydon.

OLD York in England received the memorial tablet presented by the commission appointed by Mayor Hylan of New York. The Lord Mayor of York accepted the gift, the presentation of which was attended by all city officials, the American Ambassador, and Francis H. Sisson, H. H. Charles, William H. Dodge, William H. Rankin and A. E. Mackinnon.

HOUSTON will rename its largest hotel Britannia as a special honor to the large British delegation which has been invited to the 1925 convention. A chartered ship will bear the British direct from a home port to Houston harbor.

PAUL DUPUY, publisher of Petit Parisien, is in London arranging for the French tour of 500 delegates which is to start immediately after the convention.

THE British press is paying great attention to the convention. A special issue of the Paris Edition of the New York Herald Tribune carried articles by C. S. Jackson and H. H. Charles of New York and others. Full pages have been given to convention news by many of the papers and every other available method of publicity has been used to let old London know the advertising men are in its midst. "Sweet are the uses of advertisement" is a favorite expression.

THE British Empire Exhibition is beyond the wildest fancy of the American delegates.

YOUNGEST among the convention visitors is Elaine Arnold, aged 13, of Houston, the mascot of the Texas delegation.

JACK GREEN, winner of a free trip by his essay, has just divulged that he spent the first twelve years of his life in England.

THROUGH the courtesy of Rodman Wanamaker, a farewell breakfast is to be given to the New York delegation and the British hosts at 8 o'clock Friday morning at the Carlton. It promises to be a spiffy affair.

LONDON HOUSE was fully equipped to take care of everyone. Extra telephones were installed with an operator. A commissaire on the door, messenger boys, an information clerk, and representatives of Cook's, Keith Prowse, and Western Union, answered pretty nearly every question that the hundreds of Americans hurled at their heads. A room was set aside for light refreshments, cigars, cigarettes, and looked like a clubroom with its bulletins, periodicals, and newspapers.

BRISBANE TELLS WHAT ADVERTISING IS

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

ARTHUR BRISBANE

Most recent and hitherto unpublished photograph.

ARTHUR BRISBANE, in an exclusive interview granted EDITOR & PUBLISHER this week analyzed advertising in its various phases for the benefit of newspapermen and members of the advertising profession.

The first question asked Mr. Brisbane was: "Where do you place advertising in the category of economic forces?"

"Close to the top," was his answer. "Advertising is to business what speech is to the human race."

"Where do you place it among man's inventions for material betterment and understanding?" was the second query.

"All great inventions save time and effort," he replied. "Advertising is among the greatest of time savers. It enables a man to do with his business, his book, his new idea, more in a three months' good advertising campaign than could have been done by old methods in three years or in a whole lifetime.

"What is effective advertising? Effective advertising was long ago outlined by me as follows:

"The advertisement must be SEEN.

"It must be READ.

"It must be UNDERSTOOD.

"It must be BELIEVED.

"And it must cause the reader to WANT the thing advertised.

"Futile advertising, like futile talk, futile building, futile planning, is the advertising that PRODUCES NO RESULTS. One kind of futile advertising is the advertisement written to please the man that PAYS for the advertisement, instead of being written to make money for the man that pays for the advertisement."

Asked what is the best "ad" he had ever seen and the elements that make it superlatively good work, Mr. Brisbane said:

"The best advertisement I have ever seen is the rainbow in the sky. It's one of the few advertisements that are written FOR ALL TIME. It advertises the fact that the world is not to be wiped out by flood again, and that's an important advertisement. The 'elements that make it superlatively good work' are found in the fact that it has excellent 'position,' has its entire advertising medium, THE SKY, all to itself, is seen by everybody, everybody knows what it means, and it's done in color.

"There have been many other good advertisements in history. One of the best was the writing on the walls in Rome telling what had happened in the Senate. That advertising was done by Caesar, who had brains enough to know that the way to get ahead in the world is to let the people KOOW what you are trying to do.

"Among modern advertising, one of the best lines ever written is 'You press the button, we do the rest.' Bear in mind that that would have been written, and forgotten, but for the fact that George Eastman of the Kodak company was actually able to deliver the GOODS. When you press the button, HE REALLY DID THE REST.

"An advertisement may be good, from one point of view, utterly worthless from another. For instance, Selfridge, the American from Chicago teaching London how to advertise, sent men to the Equator. On a road where perhaps a hundred people in a year would see it, and only one would be able to read it, he put a signpost saying: 'So many miles to Selfridge's.'

"That didn't bring him any purchasers from the EQUATOR, but it brought him FREE ADVERTISING."

The next question was: "What great advertisers have you known and why do you select them as extraordinary?"

"Among the best advertisements I have known are William Jennings Bryan, Lillian Russell, Einstein of the relativity theory, Duse and Maude Adams," Brisbane declared.

"The first three became widely known by talking to all comers. Einstein deserves especial praise, because he made everybody talk about his ideas, although not a dozen men in the whole world could understand them.

"Duse and Maude Adams advertised themselves well and probably without realizing it, by refusing to be interviewed, or to advertise themselves in ANY way.

"Bear in mind that for the individual to advertise himself is not egotism, but a duty. 'Let your light so shine' applies to every one of us. If you have anything worth seeing, or hearing, or buying, let the world KNOW of it.

"Among great business advertisers, I have known so many that I don't care to pick and choose among them. But of one of them, unfortunately dead, John Wanamaker, there is this to be said: In addition to being a great advertiser, he was, what is almost as important, AN INTELLIGENT EMPLOYER.

"One hot day, in the middle of July, I went to his New York store to talk to his manager about advertising in the Evening Journal. It was then a baby and required a great deal of care as babies do. Robert Ogden, the manager, was not in. But at his desk sat John Wanamaker himself, working and perspiring, with a long string of buyers waiting for instructions.

"To the question, 'What are you doing here in this kind of weather,' Wanamaker, already an old man and certainly entitled to a mid-summer vacation, replied:

"'I am here because this is the only way I can persuade Ogden to take a rest. He is overworked, but he is too much interested in the business to leave. Of course, he can't tell me that I can't attend to his work as well as he can. That wouldn't be polite, although he may believe it. So, when I come here and sit in his place and do his work, he consents to go away.'

"That little incident may help some employer to know why it is that John Wanamaker succeeded."

"Do you feel that the real power of advertising is today used or understood in general by either the sellers or users of space?" he was asked.

"No. I think that advertising in general and the real part that it might play in business, education, health and good government are as little understood by all of us as are the possibilities within the radio or the flying machine," he replied.

"No one actually REALIZES that the day is coming when a great student in his library, in an ordinary tone of voice, will talk to a hundred, five hundred, or a thousand million human beings. Few understand that the radio in ages to come will compel the adoption of a universal language on earth.

"And few, while they theoretically KNOW it, REALIZE that real estate values in Los Angeles, Seattle, Miami, Tampa will only BEGIN to develop fully when in the course of the next twenty-five years men and women fly comfortably to all of those places from Chicago and Cleveland, leaving after a late breakfast and arriving in time for luncheon.

"Advertising is THE SCIENCE OF GETTING AN IDEA FROM ONE BRAIN INTO ANOTHER. There is no limit to the usefulness and possibilities of that science.

"First, as the French critic, Boileau, said, the idea must be clear IN YOUR OWN BRAIN; and second, you must know how to find the easiest road, free of obstructions, into the other brain.

"You can't talk the same language, successfully, to a senior wrangler and to a native of the Gaboon country.

"By the way, and while it isn't literally true, it is not a bad idea for advertisers to remember what Tom Watson, of Georgia, a good speaker, although a biased thinker, used to say about his success in public speaking:

"'Always remember that it is IMPOSSIBLE to exaggerate the stupidity of the public.'"

"The question, 'Do you see radical improvements in methods and in what direction do they lie?' brought an instant affirmative.

"Yes. Luckily for the world, there is improvement in everything, from religion to engineering. Advertising has improved along all lines, because it has attracted some of the quickest, ablest, energetic minds in the country. It has had the benefit of criticism by able business men. Nothing is more valuable than criticism, based on experience.

"'The greatest single improvement in advertising I believe to be big display advertising IN COLORS. I am confirmed in this belief by Lasker, of the Lord & Thomas Company, who studies advertising possibilities carefully on behalf of clients and on his own account. He told me that he considered full-page colored advertising in the American Weekly, published with some four or five millions of Hearst Sunday newspaper, the most powerful advertising medium in the world. And I think he is right.

"I believe that display advertising will tend more and more to the use of color on certain days of the week or month."

"As I dictate this to the phonograph, with Philip Schuyler, of EDITOR & PUBLISHER, sitting beside me, waiting for the copy, I get a letter from Mr. Dayton, publisher of the Evening Journal, which I have shown to Mr. Schuyler, telling of one single advertiser, William D. Ward, the bread manufacturer, taking in one order 26 pages of color in the Saturday Home Journal, a special color supplement sold with the Saturday evening issue of the New York Evening Journal and the other Hearst evening papers throughout the country.

"In advertising, success comes to a man able to COMMAND attention. Lunching at the Waldorf one day with Mr. Whelan, head of United Cigar Stores, discussing advertising methods, I said: 'There are five hundred people in this room. One kind of advertiser would ask the woman at the desk how much to whisper, how much to shout.' If she said $5 to whisper, $50 to shout, the wrong kind of advertiser would buy TEN WHISPERS, and think he was advertising. The right kind of advertiser, with only $50 to spend, would buy ONE SHOUT and make sure that everybody heard him.

Asked whether he believed in "newspaper merchandising service," Mr. Brisbane gave an emphatic affirmative.

"I believe in newspaper merchandising service," he said.

"All REAL service is GOOD service. Many newspapers have established a merchandising service, which can reach immediately without loss of motion, and with a certain hearing, the majority of all retailers that can handle his products. I know that the New York Evening Journal and the Chicago Herald-Examiner render REAL merchandising service.'

To the last question, "Why is the newspaper the leading advertising medium in America?" the famous Hearst editorial writer gave the following answer:

"The newspaper is the leading advertising medium because REPETITION IS REPUTATION. Only the DAILY newspaper can tell the advertiser's story EVERY DAY. Only the DAILY newspaper can give to the advertiser 100 per cent in advertising.

"Proper selection of daily newspapers makes it possible to reach practically every possible purchaser, including even those that can't read. Many a father and mother has purchased a toy because the child unable to read brought the picture of a toy in an advertisement and said, 'I want it.'

"However, the fact that the newspaper is beyond question THE advertising medium, and in total results the GREATEST advertising medium, does not mean that the wise advertiser ignores other mediums.

"There are periodicals that appeal especially to women, concerning hats, dresses, etc., and reach them at the very moment when they are CONSIDERING such articles.

"There are monthlies that print magnificently, giving to the product advertised an artistic presentation with which even the best printed newspaper could not compete.

"The wise advertiser will keep pasted up over his desk the Bible text, 'Prove all things, hold fast that which is good.'

"And, incidentally, when the advertising solicitor sends in his card, he will look at that text and give the solicitor a chance to say what he has to say."

Man of action—every motion in capital letters, a fondness for which he displays in his editorials, characterizes Arthur.

Arthur Brisbane, editor, salesman of thought to the masses.

He was very busy. He always is. Newspapering, real estate, trust administration, long roads of detail over which he speeds ever faster to get out of his own dust.

His tiny office on the seventh floor of 238 Williams Street, New York, is as large as a moderate sized cupboard and looks like the dark back of a second-hand book shop. Books lined all available wall space behind glass doors in shelves from floor to ceiling. But the shelves were insufficient. An old discarded desk was piled with books ten deep; a trunk the same; and a flat topped table took care of some of the overflow. On this latter were also the current magazines.

It is a Brisbane tenet that one should crowd as much thought as possible in small spaces. He has followed this in his office, which is packed with thought compressed within book pages.

One book, closest to Brisbane's hand, was entitled, "Forty Thousand Quotations—Prose and Poetical", by Charles N. Douglas. On the shelf below was a well worn leather bound volume of the Bible. From between the leaves, many slips of paper protruded, possibly marking passages for frequent Brisbane use. Beside this book was another, "The Life of Jesus Christ."

Brisbane's own huge old-fashioned desk was a mass of papers. As a firm believer in modern time-savers, he manages to forego the pleasures of steel filing cabinets. The day's mail itself was a lofty foothill. Mountains of yesterdays piled up by this tremendous hustler towered behind it.

At this cluttered desk Brisbane sat. He had discarded his coat and his powder blue negligee shirt showed from under his vest. Not a tall man, rather inclined to roundness, his somewhat circular appearance was enhanced by the manner in which he bent over to snap out crisp phrases "in caps" into his dictating machine.

He was to lunch that noon with William Randolph Hearst at the Ritz. But he did not look like a Ritz habitué.

The spokesman and champion of the plain people was decidedly one of them, and yet far above them. In ordinary appearance, he might have been the owner of a small town grocery store. Nothing fancy about his plain gold-rimmed glasses. No black ribbon dangled across his vest to lend him vague dignity. His dark gray matter of fact suit was not superlatively pressed. High black shoes had none of the stream-line curves proclaimed by advertisers as necessary for the well dressed man. Rather they had those ugly bumps of comfort on their bunt, well polished toes. The light panama straw hat lying on a nearby chair was turning yellow, a mellow, musty yellow. Brisbane evidently doesn't think about himself; but rather where that self is going. That is why he gets there.

Yes, he was one of the plain people; but he had outclassed them. Why? By his nervous energy, perhaps. By working furiously he had created a demand, which he had to double activity to supply. By doing, instead of just thinking of doing.

I thought of Adams' book "Success," of which Brisbane is whispered to be the hero. I mentioned it to him. He said he had never read the book.

Adams' fiction hero keeps "everlasting at it" to a tragic ending. Brisbane is fortunately human. He has that likeable fallibility common to all humanity. One thing, for instance, at which he is not a wizard is remembering names of people. His mind may be a vast storehouse of apt quotations, but sometimes he slips up on name of people with whom he does frequent business. While I was with him, during about an hour, there were at least 3 occasions, when he was forced to press the button and have his able secretary do the memory work on names.

"She knows everything," he confided to me.

Yet the Hearst editor does work with the directness of a machine. With uncanny ability for concentration and versatility, he would give all his attention one moment to one matter, switching in a flash to an entirely different subject.

He would scold sharply into his "phonograph" as he calls it, answering an EDITOR & PUBLISHER question. The telephone would ring. A quick swing of his chair and he would be answering questions on entirely different matters. It might be whether or not the Fifty-seventh street side was the best for entrance to "that new apartment," in which he was interested; it might be in regard to a newspaper problem; or it might be a legal matter. Whatever it was, it was accomplished with speed.

In this swift way he has climbed upwards. Forty years ago he was a reporter on the old New York Sun. Now he very nearly tops his profession. And at 58, he still has the speed of 20.

He arrived and continues to climb by doing, instead of just thinking. And by doing, one learns how to think.

WHAT'S NEWS?

(Reprinted by Request)

"What's news?" the cub reporter said;
"What's news?" . . . The pink-haired City Ed
Glanced up and made reply: "Well, Son,
When everything is said and done
News doesn't happen every day—
That makes it news; in brief, I'd say
That news is something that's occurred
Unusually, as when a bird
Picks up an elephant and flies
Away with him; that's news—get wise!"
The cub reporter scratched his head
And cleared his throat, and smiled, and said:
"I see; I understand—I see!
You've made it very clear to me."
Then hied him forth, shy to enthuse,
But full resolved to get some news.

The day wore on; the clock ticked through
Its regular way till half-past two,
Then three, then four, then five, then they
Who toiled cleared all their junk away
And grafting passes for the show,
Put on their hats and coats to go.
And at that moment, through the door
Came one disheveled, weary, sore,
Unhappy and discouraged dub—
None other than the Hopeful Cub!
His brow was furrowed, and his cheeks
Were sunken! . . . He approaches! . . . speaks!
"I fear," he says, "I bring distress!
There is no news! . . . Go stop the press!
Things are in a most awful way!
The paper can't come out today!"

They helped him to a chair, poor boy,
So recently so filled with joy,
So fat with hope, ambition—Oh!
It was a shame to see him so!
"What's wrong?" inquired the City Ed;
He feebly lifted up his head:
"I've spent my whole day at the Zoo
Following the tip I got from you;
I've watched the elephant all day,
But not a bird came by that way!"

MAYOR SUBPOENAS EDITOR

Buffalo Official Hopes to Force News Source Revelation

Mayor Frank X. Schwab, of Buffalo, worsted in his first attempt to force a newspaper to reveal its sources of information, is going to make another effort along similar lines. Through the Buffalo Evening News it was revealed that two Buffalo detectives had beaten up Melvin Hummell, of Baltimore, mistaken by them for a confidence man. The detectives were brought before the mayor.

Midway in the proceedings, Police Chief Charles Zimmerman, of Buffalo, was handed an envelope saying the News had the names of three witnesses to the attack on the Baltimore man. The chief handed the letter to the mayor, who immediately adjourned the hearing for 10 days.

In taking this action he declared he would issue a subpoenae for William F. O'Connell, city editor of the News, and would compel him to reveal the source of information published by the News concerning the attack, which was not denied by the detectives, who plead self-defense and mistaken identity. Mr. O'Connell said later he would ignore any summons to appear before the mayor.

Recently the mayor tried to force the News to reveal sources of information relative to irregularities in the police department. Court action followed and the refusal of the News to appear before the mayor was upheld.

NEWSPAPER VETERANS MEET

National Amateur Press Association Elects Townsend President

Josephus Daniels, James M. Beck, Thomas A. Edison—of such was the creation of the National Amateur Press Association, which held its 49th annual convention in Boston, last week at the Hotel Vendome. The former Secretary of the Navy, who is also an editor, was one of the many "boys" who taught themselves the printer's trade back in the 60's. In 1869, a group of them met in Charles Scribner's office and formed the National Printers' Association. The organization was short-lived, but a number of its members later joined the Amateur Press Association which James M. Beck and Evan Reed Riale founded at Philadelphia in 1876, the Centennial year. Mr. Edison and Henry Lengler, city librarian in Chicago, were other early members. Mr. Riale was appointed historian last year by Mrs. Hazel Pratt Adams, president, and was judge of the history award, which went to Miss Edna Hyde of Palisades Park, N. J., for her "Memoirs of the Activities of the Association."

Mrs. Adams received honorable mention for her "Fifteen Years of the Blue Pencil Club." Edwin Markham judged the poetry contributions, giving the title of laureate to Max Kauffman of South Carolina. The Tryout, a club paper published in Plaistow, N. H., by C. W. Smith won the editorial award, with James F. Morton, Jr., of New York as Judge.

The association will meet next year in Detroit. In 1926, it will celebrate its 50th anniversary in Philadelphia. Officers elected were: president, Clyde G. Townsend, Pontiac, Mich.; vice-presidents, Anne Kramer and Miss Harriet R. Greenland of Brooklyn, N. Y.; secretary, William T. Harrington, Vermilion, S. D.; treasurer, W. Alvin Cook, Birmingham, Ala.; official editor, Harry R. Marlow, Warren, O.; executive judges, Mrs. Adams, George Macauley, Grand Rapids, Mich., and Miss Hyde; chairman of the committee on editorial awards for 1925, Edward H. Cole, Boston.

The delegates were guests of the Hub Journalists' Club during their three-day sojourn in Boston. The host club has been in existence since 1890.

NEW AND AUTHENTIC HISTORY OF THE HERALD OF THE BENNETTS

By ALBERT EVANDER COLEMAN—41 Years on the New York Herald staff

In March, 1843, Col. James Watson Webb made a ferocious attack on Bennett in the Courier and Enquirer, referring to him as an "alien," "unnaturalized foreigner," "rascal," "scoundrel," &c., and urged that concerted measures be taken to get rid of him. Mr. Bennett replied in a playful vein of ridicule that apparently effectually silenced the doughty colonel thereafter.

This final onslaught by Webb must have recalled to the public mind an amusing incident that occurred in June, 1842. Webb had fought a duel with Sen. Tom. Marshall of Kentucky, in the State of Delaware, and was wounded slightly in the knee. He was promptly imprisoned, and Mr. Bennett was the first to sign a petition for his pardon, and which the then Governor Seward granted. Some one in Bennett's name had sent a box of cigars to Webb, who wouldn't receive them, threatening to kick them into the street. Bennett's comment when he heard this was: "If he will apologize like a reinstated gentleman for that conduct and smoke one of these cigars, as the Indian does the calumet, as an emblem of peace, I will go to Delaware and settle his business for him quietly and satisfactorily."

Mr. Bennett ever presented a courageous, unyielding front to his critics and enemies, and in the case of the U.S.Brig. "Somers," so bitterly denounced Commander McKenzie, that his life was threatened by an anonymous correspondent who said:

"Oh, thou crooked, deformed, defaced lump! Thou slave of nature and son of hell! Beware! One word more of such abuse as your paper has teemed with, and your life pays the forfeit.

"You may affect to laugh at this—but try me. You have been threatened before, and think there is no danger, but your time is come. Go on a day longer, and your career is ended. One more attack upon McKenzie and you die!"

On June 26, 1843, Mr. Bennett for a time quitting the field of editorial conflict, sailed for Europe, "to secure better news facilities and to give the peoples of Europe a correct idea of the great American Republic, its present condition and future possibilities."

With him went his wife and child, and they did not return until late in the autumn. Again the burden of editorship was assumed by Mr. Atree, who had the able assistance of J. Sherwood Doyle, a famous reporter, and of Frederic Hudson, who had already developed marked journalistic talent.

Editorially Mr. Bennett said: "During the absence of the proprietor, the Herald will be conducted with the same energy and enterprise that has heretofore marked its course—and by the same gentlemen in their several departments, who have been connected with it for years past."

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

Mr. Bennett Defined His Political Attitude—Discussed the Doings of Certain Clergymen and Opposed Greeley and Socialism—Final Disgraceful Attack on Him in Book Form—Has More Fun With Colonel Webb

EARLY in 1844 began the attempt to organize anew the Democratic Party, and which was greatly aided by Mr. Bennett's whole hearted support and advice. He attacked the old Whig Party as "corrupt and dangerous"; gave a partial support to the "Young America" movement, which promised "great reforms in city affairs," lamented the "degradation of the present age," and finally on December 2, 1844, again clearly enunciated his own political views and policies as follows:

"The elements for the regeneration of politics are in our midst. Foremost among them is an independent press. This is an influence which will 'grow with the growth, and strengthen with the strength' of the Republic, and so far as our control over it extends—thanks to an intelligent public—that influence will ever be exerted for the circulation of the truth and the whole truth, wholly irrespective of party or sect—the inculcation of sound principles of liberal and enlightened legislation—the rebuke of intolerance, partizanship and demagogueism, and the promotion of true, intelligent and active patriotism."

In February, 1844, Col. Webb made desperate efforts to secure a full share of the estate of his wife's uncle, Robert Stewart, though he owed it $17,000 previously loaned to him. He published disgraceful attacks on Lispenard Stewart, the executor, and others in his paper, and generally made such a scandalous exhibition of greed and malice that Mr. Bennett devoted considerable space to the matter in the Herald, and finally inserted a clever hit at the Colonel's importunity in the following form:

"ADVERTISEMENT FOR A LEGACY:—Wanted, By a highly respectable military man, who formerly belonged to the 'regular army,' and who is a Christian to boot, a legacy of at least $50,000. If that amount cannot be left him by some generous individual in any part of the country, he would accept even of a legacy of $40,000; but on no consideration would he think of taking a legacy under $30,000—that being his lowest mark.

"The Advertiser has been living for 20 years past in daily and certain expectation of getting this legacy; and during that time he has obtained and expended several hundred thousand dollars, besides getting into debt for $200,000, for which he took the benefit of the Bankruptcy Act.

"He is now very clear of all debt. He is in a perfect condition of safety, and the only thing he wants to make his felicity complete in this world is that same legacy of $50,000. If John Jacob Astor or any rich man in New York, will take this matter into immediate consideration, he will feel very much obliged, and will publish for him in the columns of the Courier and Enquirer, one of the warmest eulogies and most effecting obituaries ever printed. For further information apply at 57 Wall Street. All letters must be postpaid, or be put down in the next schedule of bankruptcy."

The feelings of the Colonel on being lampooned in this atrocious fashion can be better imagined than described.

When the Madisonian, a Washington newspaper, collapsed in February, 1844, Mr. Bennett thus jokingly noticed the sad event:

"A WORD TO JOHN JONES:—Is John Jones used up? Had the Madisonian been knocked on the head? Do tell! We have not seen a copy of John's paper for several days past. What's the matter? Do let us know?"

Under the startling heading of "The Great Theological Cockfight," the Herald gave full reports, early in 1844, of the bitter controversy between Rev. Dr. Potts and Rev. Dr. Wainwright over some question as to Episcopal church polity—in fact, issuing an extra giving the correspondence in full, and Mr. Bennett, with reckless disregard of the conventionalities, thus depicted one of the first eager purchasers of a copy of the extra:

"A very singular looking, gentlemanly personage, was among the first who called and bought a copy. He had a roguish smile on his unhealthy face—a strange flashing in his burning eyes—and as he left the office, we saw a tail peep from under his Spanish cloak, and something like a cloven foot in his boots. Who was he? When the boy took his two cents they actually turned to brimestone in is hand, and blazing up in a blue light, entirely disappeared, being a new species of defalcation that we never saw before."

In a subsequent skit he discussed the question, "Can a church exist without a steeple?"

In the same year Bishop Onderdonk was tried by an Ecclesiastical Court on charges of indiscreet conduct with females and excessive use of stimulants. The trial was held in secret and rival reporters tried hard to get summaries of the evidence. The Herald, while giving all the authentic information it could secure, yet editorially treated the case in a fair minded manner and its impartial attitude was generally recognized and commended.

Mr. Bennett, however, vigorously combatted Rev. Theodore Parker's views as to the divinity of Jesus Christ, summarizing the clergyman's statements as follows:

"He regards Christ as a mere man, but of superior intellect. There are yet to come other Christs, Mr. Parker holds, and he probably regards himself as one of them. In this his creed resembles that of the great apostle of the Mormons, Joe Smith."

In 1844 Albert Brisbane, the father of William R. Heart's present chief editorial writer and executive, became a strenuous advocate of Fourier's new and fallacious Socialistic and Communistic theories. On his return from Paris he tried to convert Mr. Bennett to his views, but found the Scotch editor far too "hard headed" and practical to believe in the new doctrines. Brisbane then turned to Horace Greeley, who became a very docile disciple of the French apostle's teachings. Mr. Bennett described Brisbane and Greeley as two "very remarkable young men—devoted enthusiasts—somewhat eccentric—careless of their dress, but full of determination to remodel the social fabric."

Communities were established in Pike County, Pa., and other remote places, and later Mr. Bennett became genuinely alarmed at the results of their efforts, which he bitterly denounced as "having met with a tide of success almost astonishing, and which apparently threatens the whole social edifice—politics—morals—religion—property—marriage—everything!"

Later he ridiculed Greeley's fanatical zeal in advocating "such dangerous doctrines," and in trying to inject them into national politics. Greeley was furious and wrote a hot editorial, denouncing Bennett as a "liar" and a "villain." Brisbane was greatly shocked, disapproving of his comrade's violent language, and personally expressed his regrets to Mr. Bennett, who in later articles thoroughly exposed the falsity and danger of Fourier's rotten theories.

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

Facts first, then fun—MARC A. ROSE

"LOOK to the suburbs" was the suggestion offered this week by Marc A. Rose, managing editor of the Buffalo News, a young newspaper maker with un-Babbit-like vision who won't stand still.

It is a suggestion, which, as Rose pointed out, applies equally to cities larger or smaller than Buffalo.

"Too frequently editors forget that their cities are going to grow," he declared. "When once their newspapers become metropolitan, they become content with national, foreign, and news of their immediate metropolitan district. They overlook the seemingly trivial stories from the surrounding towns and suburban communities.

"But we have found it wise to look to the suburbs. We favor them, perhaps, out of proportion to their desserts. We do it deliberately, because we believe that in trying to cultivate suburban readers we are cultivating the best elements of our circulation field—the readers who will pay our advertisers the most."

The Buffalo News, Rose explained, "looks to the suburbs" carefully, but not to the extent of trivial personal items. Care is taken to include all news of civic affairs in the suburbs, and the larger social entertainments. Space for this suburban news averages about two columns of agate daily. It is easily obtainable. Good correspondents are found in some of the suburbs; regular members of the staff who live outside of the city cover the news of their neighborhoods; while one reporter, with the use of an office automobile, has a run out through the larger nearby towns.

"And we believe it is a good editorial policy, because it works," is the assertion of Mr. Rose.

"We recently employed observers to watch the various suburban trains. The passengers wanted to learn the news of their communities. Our observers reported that the great majority turned to our suburban columns first of all."

Rose is a detail man. He is devoted to newspaper work and takes his affection seriously, not just sentimentally. He has never done anything but newspapering all his life; and he is doing just what he wants to do.

Since he left the New York Sun for Buffalo 4 years ago, he has consistently concerned himself with the building up of a complete newspaper. While he has been with the News he has rounded out and expanded all the departments of that daily. Its financial and business pages particularly have been vastly developed.

"I believe," he said to me at one time, "in the theory that the average newspaper reader buys his paper for the kind of stuff that the ordinary smart aleck reporter thinks is dry rot. What the fresh young newspaper man throws on the floor, I think holds subscribers year after year.

"I mean the marriage and death notices, shipping reports, real estate transfers, lists of deeds and mortgages, wills filed for probate, and every little thing that the city council does, carefully classified.

"In other words, I think people read their newspapers for information and solid fact information.

"I will never forget a talk I had one time with a very prominent man. I asked him what newspaper he read, and he named one, which, at the time, I thought horribly dull.

" 'Don't you find it dry, heavy, and unentertaining,' I asked him.

" 'Why,' he replied, 'do men read newspapers for entertainment? I think that the great big solid mass of people, Mr. Ordinary Every Day Average Citizen, is reading his paper first of all to find out what has happened. This gives him entertainment of a sort. But first of all, he wants facts.' "

Rose, who is now 36, began newspaper work when he was 12 on the Waukegan (Ill.) Sun. Of course, at first it was part time, but at 16 he settled down to newspapering in earnest.

He wanted to become a reporter on the Chicago Tribune; he decided at about this time, because he had heard that Tribune reporters sometimes made as much as $50 a week.

But he never "made the Trib." Instead he worked successively on the Joliet (Ill.) Herald, the Memphis (Tenn.) News-Scimiter, the New Orleans Times, and the Atlanta Georgian before coming to New York, where he began with the old New York Press. On the Press and later on the Sun, he made all stops up to assistant city editor, which chair he was occupying when he left to accept his present position.

FORM PRESS GALLERY FOR MURDER TRIAL

Grand Jury Room Set Aside for Reporters Covering Franks Case in Chicago—Tickers Allowed in Court, If Noiseless

Complete plans for the accommodation of reporters and photographers at the trial of Nathan Leopold and Richard Loeb for the kidnaping and murder of Robert Franks, 14 years old, were announced this week by Chief Justice John R. Caverly, of the Cook county criminal court, The trial has been set for August 4.

Attendance is to be limited to approximately 250 persons, and there will be provision for about fifteen reporters. The largest ante-room of the grand jury quarters will be turned over to the newspapers and press associations. There they may install typewriters, telegraph and telephone wires. A guard will be provided to keep the public out of this room, which will accommodate 150 reporters.

As a measure of safety, photographers will be forbidden to take flastlight pictures, except during the first few minutes of the noon recess. News associations will be permitted to use so-called "noiseless" tickers—if they are proved actually to be noiseless—in a demonstration before the Chief Justice.

Feature writers and magazine men and women will be forced to take their chances with the general public, except that the front row of seats will be reserved for them.

A large corps of deputy sheriffs will be employed to enforce the court's regulations, Chief Justice Caverly said. The arrangements, he added, are based on his belief that the trial will be a long one.

NEWSPAPER LIBRARIANS ELECT KWAPIL

Public Ledger Man Named President at Saratoga Springs Meet—Methods Discussed—Permanent Group Organized

A permanent organization of newspaper librarians to be affiliated with the Special Libraries Association was voted at the first session of the Newspaper Group of the Special Libraries Association at a recent meeting held at Saratoga Springs, N. Y.

Joseph F. Kwapil, librarian of the Philadelphia Public Ledger was elected president of the group. Other officers named were: William Alcott, Boston Globe, vice-president; Miss Agnes J. Petersen, Milwaukee Journal, secretary; Maurice Symonds, New York Daily News, treasurer; Paul P. Foster, Boston Herald, Miss M. B. Goodman of the Congressional Index, Washington, Miss Emma R. Kiel of the Buffalo Evening News, and John H. Miller of King Feature Syndicate of New York, executive committee.

It was voted that the membership fee would be $1.00 and that charter membership be offered to all newspaper librarians who had responded favorably to the invitation to the conference.

The subject of standard classification was discussed. Members described salient points of their filing systems. The Dewey classification system, while approved for books, found no friends for its application to newspaper clippings.

Another subject taken up was methods of filing photos.

Mr. Miller described the system of the King Feature Syndicate, where photographs are filed not by prosaic subject, but by unusual titles, such as "Vampires," "Handshaking," "Drink," "Hoaxes," "Bridal," "Peace," "Race Suicide," "Large Families," "Titles," (to abolish), "Lovemaking," "Spendthrifts," "Courtesy" and "For Sale," the latter being that of the young woman who offered to sell herself in marriage.

A suggestion calling for a second meeting of the group in the fall is being considered by the executive committee.

Curfew for Newsboys

The police department of Portland, Me., has prohibited newsboys from selling Sunday morning newspapers on the streets after 9 o'clock on Saturday nights upon the complaints of mothers of the boys who claimed many of them were remaining out all night. The action was taken under the old curfew law.

A Highly Concentrated Market

Here in Washington are nearly half a million well-to-do people—a greater population concentrated in the less than 70 square miles of the District of Columbia than is distributed throughout any one of eight entire states, covering hundreds of miles in area.

Washingtonians deposited in their local financial institutions during the last fiscal year almost a quarter of a billion dollars. They buy what their tastes and inclinations demand—and have the money to pay for it.

You don't get close to Washingtonians except through their local papers—but it is one of the half dozen notable communities in the country where ONE newspaper reaches practically everybody.

The Star's circulation is nearly equal to the number of homes in Washington—and goes directly into the home—which is where advertising has its supreme value.

Specific information concerning the Washington market will be furnished upon request.

BAKER OF ITHACA NAMED PRESIDENT OF N. Y. STATE PRESS ASSOCIATION

New Constitution Adopted—Secretary's Report Shows Membership Gain—N. E. A. Advertising Schedule Endorsed—200 Members Attend

ALEXANDRIA BAY, N. Y., July 12. —With an attendance which exceeded that of any meeting in recent years the New York Press Association today closed its 72nd annual convention with the elevation of John W. Baker, general manager of the Ithaca Journal-News to the presidency. The convention was marked throughout by its businesslike character. The members endorsed the schedule of advertising rates of the National Editorial Association and while it is impossible to bring about unanimous action among the 200 newspapers belonging to the New York Press Association, many of the publishers present expressed a determination to bring their rates into closer harmony with the N. E. A. scale.

JOHN W. BAKER

The Association adopted a constitution which will take effect in January. If the Association ever had a constitution it passed out of existence many years ago and the need for a basic law has been noted by the officers, especially since the extension of the work of the Association with the appointment of a field secretary nearly two years ago.

Under the new constitution newspapers and periodicals of New York State published not less frequently than once a month are eligible to active membership.

The associate membership is limited by the new constitution to retired publishers and newspaper workers and persons connected with industries allied with publishing.

Another change the new constitution brings about is in the meetings of the Association. After January 1 ,1925, the annual meeting will be held in February instead of in the summer. The constitution reads "the other meeting shall be a summer outing, to be held in June or July. Business may be transacted at the summer meeting, if necessary."

The annual address of President Peter A. Blossom was of an inspirational rather than an informative character.

Touching upon the duties of newspaper publishers as American citizens in his annual address President Peter A. Blossom said:

"Many associations have codes of ethics —the practice of which is absolutely essential and for the most part is practiced as between members of the press. But is there not even a more necessary code of ethics, which I am sorry to say is seldom thought of, let alone practiced, among the metropolitan press—that code of ethics which should guide newspapers in relation to the public. You can send anyone to heaven on a tombstone or drive them to hell in a newspaper headline. I appeal for the Golden Rule in headlines and news items."

Field Secretary Jay W. Shaw reported that during the past year the Association increased its membership from 172 active and 55 associate members, to 210 active and 49 associate members.

At the opening session Thursday morning, James A. Hamilton, Secretary of State, extended the greetings of New York State to the publishers and W. E. Flanders, secretary of the Alexandria Bay Chamber of Commerce delivered the address of welcome.

Other addresses on the program were as follows:

"Memorial to A. O. Bunnell," led by W. H. Clark, Cortland Standard, assisted by W. J. Kline, Amsterdam Recorder; Garry A. Willard, Boonville Herald; A. C. Kessinger, Rome Sentinel; E. S. Underhill, Sr., Bath Advocate.

At the conclusion of the business meeting, Saturday morning a special resolution was passed commending the work of the Empire State School of Printing at Ithaca and urging members of the Association to co-operate with the officers of the school in securing enrollment and placing graduates.

PRINTING SCHOOL ENDORSED

N. Y. State Publishers Vote to Continue Support at Ithaca Meet

Endorsement of the most substantial character was given the Empire State School of Printing, at Ithaca, N. Y., Monday, July 7, when members of the New York State Publishers' Association voted to continue assessments for the support of the school during 1924 on the same basis as for the last two years.

The financial report on the school showed that the association has obligations of nearly $4,500 to meet before it will own its $30,000 school plant free from incumbrance.

Director Ross W. Kellogg reported that the school now has 66 graduates at work in newspaper composing rooms and commercial printing plants of New York State, Vermont and Pennsylvania. Of this number 20 are working for members of the association.

Director Kellogg called attention to the financial assistance rendered the school during the last year by the American Newspaper Publishers' Association and the Publishers' Association of New York City, giving particular credit to Victor Ridder of the Staats Zeitung and Lincoln B. Palmer, manager of the A. N. P. A., for enlisting the support of these two organizations.

In an executive session, H. N. Kellogg of Indianapolis, chairman of the special standing committee of the A. N. P. A., led a round table discussion on labor problems.

HOLD SUMMER MEETING

Although social features overshadowed business at the summer meeting of the New York State Associated Dailies, held Tuesday and Wednesday of last week at Auburn, N. Y., a "brass tacks" discussion of newspaper problems was held with the question box as a basis. This year the Associated Dailies confined their business sessions to an exchange of information and dispensed with formal papers or talks on publishing topics.

Tuesday evening at Springside Inn, Samuel Hopkins Adams, Professor Frank W. Moore and William G. Wendell addressed a banquet attended by members of the association and guests.

Business sessions were held in the library of the home of Thomas Mott Osborne, principal stockholder of the Auburn Citizen and noted prison reform worker.

In Cincinnati One Daily Newspaper Has Mass Circulation Including Complete Class Circulation and No Waste Circulation

The population of the "City Circulation Area" of Cincinnati, according to A. B. C., is 141,000 families.

The same authority credits the Times-Star with a daily city circulation of 112,062. This is practically the entire native white, literate population of the city—the only population whose purchasing habits you could hope to influence by any advertising. Practically 100% mass market including practically 100% class market and no waste!

The only other evening paper of large circulation in Cincinnati reaches 84,534 families in the city circulation area,—75% of the city market.

No morning newspaper of comparable circulation in Cincinnati is a member of A. B. C. But the largest daily morning city circulation claimed by any publisher is 41,879,—a coverage of approximately 37% of the city market.

These circulation figures with their implications undoubtedly explain why the Times-Star for sixteen consecutive years has carried more display advertising, both local and national, than any other Cincinnati newspaper. Its leadership in 1923 broke all previous records and 1924 is showing a significant gain over 1923.

—can you imagine

the successful retailer content to advertise to a hundred prospective customers when there are thousands in his market, or just a thousand if there are millions?

And further, that the same retailer would appeal to hundreds, thousands, or millions living in territory he could not serve?

Ridiculous? What about the manufacturer who does that very thing—the manufacturer with spotty distribution who misuses advertising in mediums of national circulation obviously reaching just a few, often less than a hundred customers right where his goods are on sale and thousands upon thousands where he hasn't a nickel's worth of distribution?

MITCHELL THE TAILOR APPLIED FORD METHODS AND WON SUCCESS

Boston Man Combines High Values and Low Prices With Wide Newspaper Advertising and Reaps Sales—Uses Individual Copy

By HAMMOND EDWARD FRANKLIN

A CERTAIN advertising man said the other day: "If I were a retailer, I would aim to build my business on a Ford basis. I would buy in large quantities the best goods at the lowest prices, do business on a narrow margin, work all the time for huge volume, and use newspaper advertising in a big way to bring this about."

Mitchell, the Tailor, has achieved success on exactly this policy. Information as to what he has done should be passed along to other retailers in other lines as an inspiration as to what they can do.

Some 22 years ago W. H. Sullivan, who had been a Boston newsboy, bought out the name and good-will of Mitchell, the Tailor, who has been in business at Lynn, Mass. Sullivan decided to continue the same name when he opened up his little establishment on Washington street in Boston.

He was the whole business, but he knew textiles, cutting and fitting—and he had a real flair for newspaper advertising.

When his business was founded, it was quite the thing for men to have their clothes fitted to order. Since then ready-to-wear clothes have become common, but this man's business in making suits to order has grown immensely from that humble beginning years ago.

In checking up on how he did it, some time ago I found that Mr. Sullivan's organization had 400 employes and sold through 12 stores. His annual expenditure for newspaper advertising figures between $75,000 and $100,000, I was informed.

"First of all, we buy nothing but the best goods," M. F. Sullivan, manager of the Boston store and brother of the proprietor of the business, explained. "My brother does all the buying personally, direct from the woolen houses—not from the mills. He has found he can buy cheaper from the woolen houses than from the mills. He buys for cash and he buys right. He knows fabrics thoroughly.

"Value at a low price has always been a big talking point with us. At times we make special offers, such as offering free pants or fancy vests without extra charge.

"Some retail stores marketing ready-to-wear clothing do not have all sizes. A man may go to them in search of 37 when the store is out of it, although it has 36 or 38. Here we take measurements. We cut suits and overcoats to the exact fit of our customers.

Typographical beauty is not this copy's reason for life, but it appears to get results for the tailor.

"We have found it pays to be fair on adjustments. If a man justifiedly 'kicks' or almost without reason complains about what he bought in any way, we fit him to a new suit."

In one of the smallest stores in Boston, only 14 feet wide and 60 feet long, Mitchell, the Tailor, does what is without doubt the biggest volume of business of its kind in the city.

The store is located on Washington street in "Newspaper row" and the busy retail district. Its sales are handled by but 4 men, including Manager Sullivan. It also is headquarters for stores in other cities, which have included Providence, R. I.; Hartford, Conn.; Springfield, Mass.; New Bedford, Lowell, Worcester, Lawrence, Manchester, N. H.; Brockton, Mass., and 3 stores in New York City.

Advertising for these stores is placed from Boston. Located in nearby office buildings, adjoining the Boston store, are 5 coat shops, 4 pants shops, and 2 vest shops.

The other morning a man whose wife had just died came in at quarter of eleven. He received the suit that afternoon to wear at the funeral next day.

The Mitchell store clerks are paid on a straight salary basis, as also are the store managers. Mr. Sullivan believes the commission form tempts the salesman to oversell.

In addition to stores, he has men traveling in territories outside of cities where he has stores. These salesmen hold demonstrations in which they show 100 different styles of fabrics.

Eight months of the year, a huge horse-drawn display wagon, exhibiting suitings and their cost, made up complete, parades through the heart of Boston. Another does the same at Providence. These wagons, which cost about $2,000 apiece, have been real drawing cards. A wire strung along both sides of the wagon has cloth samples pasted on paper, with details and cost made into a suit. Many men have walked into the store with the sample in their hands to order a suit or have placed an order with the driver. About 200,000 samples have been distributed annually.

Newspaper advertising has spread the Mitchell, the Tailor, story throughout New England. Practically every man in that section is familiar with this advertiser, the success of whose copy is shown by the size of his business and the money he has made.

You perhaps can remember when the concave shoulder type of clothing was the rage. It is out of style now, but a picture of Mr. Sullivan's head on concave shoulders has been a trade-mark which has continued to be used in practically all Mitchell, the Tailor, advertising. If the full head and shoulders do not appear, the head alone does.

The copy is written in the first person, sprinkled with plenty of I's. It is positive and straightforward. It is written by Mr. Sullivan himself and as such carries an atmosphere peculiar to his thinking. It practically always is built around a special value.

A half-page in the newspapers said in part:

"Someone bought the eggs. Someone bought milk. Someone bought butter. I bought the woolens from the farmers of New Hampshire, Virgin Wool collected by an aggregation of New Hampshire farmers and made up into cloth in the state of New Hampshire. In order to keep a large force of help busy during the dull seasons, to each customer ordering a suit of New Hampshire woolens during the next ten days I offer a pair of pants free with suit to order, $19.75."

In an advertisement used a number of weeks ago, Mitchell, the Tailor, showed a drawing of a lamb, with arrows pointing out where the various kinds of wool come from. Instead of a lamb's head, the Mitchell head appears. The copy tells how the New Hampshire Farmers' Association again has sold its woolens to him. The tailor offers a three-piece suit to order for $17.75.

The Mitchell, the Tailor, stores are open from 7:30 a. m. to 9 p. m. week days. They remain open all holidays except July 4 and December 25. These stores serve between 1,500 and 2,000 buyers a week, a total of about 80,000 a year, all on a strictly cash basis.

W. H. Sullivan, who has developed this business through the policies outlined here, has become wealthy. He owns one of the most handsome homes in Massachusetts, has boats and motor cars. Nevertheless, he is on the job every day for long hours and is said by his friends to be as democratic as when he was the "whole works." He does no selling on the floor, but handles the buying, advertising and general management.

Without his other fundamentals right, Sullivan could never have achieved the success he has with newspaper advertising alone. But given the other essentials (à la Henry Ford), his newspaper copy has pulled big and fully justified his liberal annual expenditure for space (largely on the sport pages). The total of his advertising has grown greatly with the years.

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

Gains in Total Paid Advertising Local Display Advertising National Advertising & Real Estate & Want Ads for 6 Months ENDING JUNE 30

The Post-Dispatch was the only St. Louis newspaper to make a clear record of Gains in Total Paid Advertising, Local Display Advertising, National Advertising and Real Estate and Want Advertising during the first six months of 1924, and in addition established a new high six-month record for itself —and of course for St. Louis.

Total Paid Advertising for First Six Months of 1924:

POST-DISPATCH alone,	11,733,400 Lines
Globe-Democrat and The Star COMBINED...	10,477,800 Lines
Post-Dispatch Excess Over Both.....	1,255,600 Lines

As in Many Previous Semi-Annual Periods, the POST-DISPATCH Alone Carried More Advertising than the Globe-Democrat and The Star Combined

The Daily Post-Dispatch alone has more City Circulation than the morning and one other evening newspaper combined.

BRAZIL REVOKES RIGHT OF U. P. AND A. P. TO SEND OR RECEIVE NEWS

Drastic Censorship Order Suspends Activities of Brazilian Bureaus—U. P. Correspondent Arrested—Both Services Appeal to State Department

THE rights of the United Press and the Associated Press to send or receive news dispatches in Brazil were revoked by a drastic censorship order issued by the Brazilian government Tuesday, July 15, effecting a complete shutdown of the services of these organizations to their clients in the South American Republic.

C. M. KINSOLVING

The order came unexpectedly as the most rigid regulation of a military censorship which had already obtained control of radio, telegraph and telephone in an effort to prevent all but official news of the Sao Paulo revolution from reaching the world.

U. G. KEENER

Charles M. Kinsolving, general manager of the United Press in Brazil, was arrested by the Brazilian authorities on July 9, on a charge of being defiant of the Brazil censor. His release was obtained after several hours by the American Chargé d'Affaires and he has enjoyed complete freedom ever since. A message to this effect was received by the United Press on July 16 and was the first information received in America that the Brazilian government was taking exceptional methods of controlling the news of the revolution.

With Kinsolving in Rio de Janeiro as news manager of the United Press in Brazil is U. G. Keener.

Both the U. P. and the A. P. have called the situation to the attention of the State Department at Washington, with the request that official inquiries be made.

Efforts of both associations to learn the truth in regard to the situation have been hampered by their inability to get in touch with their correspondents. On Thursday, July 17, Karl A. Bickel, president of the United Press, stated that no word whatever had been received from either Kinsolving or Keener for 24 hours. Jackson S. Elliot, assistant general manager of the Associated Press, reported that no word had been received from Maylor for several days.

Two foreign news services operating in Brazil, the Agencia Americana and the Havas Agency, have not been restrained from transmitting news, according to advices received by the American associations. The Agencia Americana is the official subsidized Brazilian service, while Havas is the official subsidized agency of the French government.

"As far as could be learned, the services of the Agence Havas was not interfered with, indicating discrimination against the American press associations," a United Press dispatch received in New York Thursday declared.

That the Brazilian censorship is one of the most stringent ever placed in effect is seen in the fact that nothing but official government communiques have reached the outside world regarding the revolution for nearly a week. A few dispatches have come through from Buenos Aires, capital of the Argentine, but these have given but meagre and guarded accounts of the revolution.

All the afternoon newspapers published Wednesday in Brazil printed editorials condemning the government for its action in suspending the services of the American associations, a U. P. report from Buenos Aires declared. Rio de Janeiro newspapers of July 12 reaching Montevideo were filled with white spaces where the censors had stricken out matter displeasing to the government.

Charles M. Kinsolving, U. P. correspondent arrested in Rio, was born in Brazil, his father being Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Southern Brazil. He served with the Lafayette Escadrille during the earlier part of the World War, later joining the American Army. After the war he returned to Sao Paulo to become secretary of the American Chamber of Commerce. In 1922 he was brought to New York by the United Press Associations, and after working in the New York and Washington offices returned to Rio de Janeiro last year as Brazilian general manager.

U. G. Keener, Brazil news manager for the United Press, went to Buenos Aires in 1920 from Washington, where he worked for several years. He is 24 years old, and was born in Oklahoma. By way of adventure, Keener and a friend worked their way to Montevideo from Baltimore on a Norwegian sailing vessel, a voyage which took 65 days. After joining the United Press staff in Buenos Aires, he was sent to Rio de Janeiro as assistant manager of the Bureau in that city.

ITALIAN DAILIES FIGHT FASCIST CENSORSHIP

Refuse to Accept Government Plan for News Control Following Mateotti Murder—Plan Appeal to King

Attempts of the Fascist government in Italy to muzzle the press are being fought by newspaper publishers, Olindo Malagodi, correspondent of La Nacion of Buenos Aires and former editor of La Tribuna of Rome has cabled the South American daily.

The present censorship attempts have grown out of the Mateotti case which recently attracted the attention of the world and nearly wrecked the Mussolini regime. The Cabinet decided to invoke an edict which had been previously approved but never enforced, which would place the proprietor and editor, or one of them, at the mercy of the Prefect of his Command. The Prefect would be advised by an advisory council composed of at least one judge and one newspaperman. In the first offense the paper would be warned and in the second more severely warned and in the third virtual suspension of the paper would result.

When news of the proposed enforcement of the press control measure spread in Italy last week, a large majority of the newspapers including many pro-Fascist papers opposed it. Many expressed willingness to accept the sacrifice but only on a condition that it must be a temporary measure.

And reaching into every nook and corner of this wonderfully responsive section—eagerly and heartily welcomed each day into every worthwhile home, is the great COMMERCIAL APPEAL.

No other large American newspaper has attained such complete circulation coverage of its field. No other American newspaper enjoys, in greater measure, the confidence, trust, and esteem of its readers.

This complete coverage of a rich and prosperous field, combined with the respectful attention, the faith, and the confidence which its readers give to and feel in the COMMERCIAL APPEAL and its contents—news, editorial, and advertising—has made it tremendously resultful and valuable to advertisers of worthy products who use its columns.

The COMMERCIAL APPEAL stands first in local circulation, first in total circulation, first in local advertising, first in national advertising, first in total advertising.

The COMMERCIAL APPEAL during June carried nearly seven thousand more inches of advertising than the other two papers combined. The COMMERCIAL APPEAL carried double the amount of National advertising and double the amount of classified advertising carried by the others combined.

EDITORIAL

A BRILLIANT SUCCESS

CABLE reports of the international advertising convention at Wembley indubitably testify to an occasion far more brilliant and useful to the cause represented than its most sanguine votaries had anticipated.

The twentieth annual convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World is plainly recorded as the classic event in the history of organized selling through the printed word.

We have relished the breezy atmosphere, the good humor, the down-to-earth cordiality, the intrinsic simplicity, the brothering and the plain, brass-tack talk of the convention quite as much as we have enjoyed the news of our delegation's graceful acceptance of whole-hearted British hospitality amid scenes of splendor and ancient glory.

The American advertising man, business from the heels up, ate plum pudding and drank tea with his English host, hard-headed conservative who knows not only how to create but how to conserve wealth, and for dessert the American cut a Texas watermelon and demonstrated how it might be eaten without dampening the ears, and a new fellowship was figuratively thus established, long to endure and certain to intensify with time.

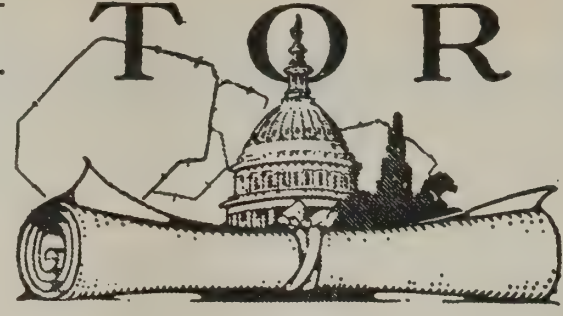
Some of the greatest men in British trade and politics, under the personal patronage of the Prince of Wales, not only handed to the delegates the keys to the ancient and beautiful gray metropolis, but took them into the inner circles and with a spirit which has brought forth world-wide comment gave a thousand evidences of understanding, appreciation and sound friendship. Purely as a social event the convention is in many respects unprecedented.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER congratulates the A. A. C. W. and predicts for it a peak year of useful service. The re-election of Lou Holland, as president, and Jesse H. Neal, as secretary-treasurer, is a happy and well deserved tribute to them individually and represents the good sense of the delegates. Mr. Holland is particularly honored, for his selection for a third term is without precedent in the history of the organization.

"Houston, Texas, Next." That was inevitable and justifies the confidence of the public in the Texan to know what he wants and to get it. The appeal that Houston made for the 1925 convention was irresistible and EDITOR & PUBLISHER predicts for that city during July of next year "doings" which will rival even the brilliant spectacle of the current week on the "Tight Little Isle."

Of course, behind it all lies the promise of a better day for the great industry of selling through advertising, which means an improved science, a higher experience, greater prosperity, broadened freedom of the press through economic independence, with consequent and obvious public benefits. Many times, in a thousand practical ways, the A. A. C. W. has justified the purpose and the aspirations of its founders.

Light and gay—the summer mood in reading matter as in food and dress.



FRENCH STUNTS

WE have much to learn from the French press on the side of newspaper entertainment. The news reporting in many of the Paris newspapers amounts to literature, although much of it expresses opinion, even passion. The French press is notable also for humor, spiced and sparkling.

It is in the field of what we know as "stunting" that the French journalist excels. Guy Hickok, resident correspondent of Brooklyn Daily Eagle, calls our attention to an example of this peculiar publicity art of French editors.

On the eve of a transportation strike Robert de Jouvenel, late editor of L'Oeuvre, instructed his reporting staff to reach the office the next day in the most picturesque manner possible, and asked each of them to write a story.

De Jouvenel came himself on an old-fashioned three-wheeled velocipede. Another reporter rode in on a donkey, and a third arrived in a sedan chair borne by four carriers. A fourth came two miles on a pair of enormous stilts. L'Oeuvre's strike story that day was the most readable in Paris.

ISAIAH

CHAPTER XIV. 25.

EVIDENCE OF FAILURE

MUSSOLINI continues to demonstrate to the sophisticated in journalism that his government must have grave faults, if it cannot bear the light of publicity, and requires a muzzle for a Roman newspaper for mild criticism of the Fascist regime. New York World, commenting on this latest act of suppression, said: "If by so doing he thinks he has stopped criticism, then he is like the proverbial person who stopped his watch to prevent time from passing by."

Local bankers, who know how much money is leaving your city for investment in worthless stock schemes, should support newspaper campaigns in paid space intended to conserve those funds for local and safe investment.

AN IMPOSSIBLE SITUATION

"THE tragedy of Minnesota Star," farmer and labor daily of the northwest which recently collapsed, is discussed by a correspondent of The Nation who contends that the failure traces to the "false premise that a newspaper cannot be expected to draw support from the financial forces which it is founded to oppose." We think he is mistaken. Many newspapers operate successfully on policies which are opposed to or offensive to advertisers. Our understanding of the failure of the Minnesota Star was that it was bossed and policied to death. No editor or business manager can make much progress in producing a daily if they are constantly threatened and confused by rival camps of stockholders, each a zealous crusader or malcontent and each with a different idea of what the newspaper's policy and business administration should be.

Test of newspaper honor: To as freely admit the failure of the issue you have campaigned for, as to claim the honor of victory when you have won. Not often done, but nothing gains prestige so quickly.

NATIVE SELLING WIT

"HEY, boss—shine 'em up like diamonds!"" It was a toothless kid with an old-fashioned boot-black box under his arm on City Hall Plaza, New York, possessed of native advertising wit. "Shine 'em up like diamonds"—an irresistible appeal if you felt the need of such ministration to basic respectability. He got our dime and a tip.

We have known newsboys who were able to coin selling lines, brilliant because of their simple and direct appeal. When flash extras were issued concerning Queen Victoria's death, after a lingering illness, we saw a boy on 14th Street, New York, passing them out as fast as he could make change and constantly yelling, "She's dead," "She's dead," "She's dead."

A boy who knew news values better than the editor of the paper he was selling was seen last week in Brooklyn passing them out like hot cakes with this winning cry: "Six runs in seventh give Dodgers' game."

In rough letters on a huge cardboard a Long Island farmer's boy, selling fruits and vegetables to passing automobilists, presented his wares with this line: "Yellow apples, soft and sweet, black seeds inside." Can't you fairly taste them? It took genius to suggest the ripe mellowness and sweetness that "black seeds" indicate in an apple.

An eight-year-old school girl, in an essay on her pets, described her "dear kitty" as: "Soft and curling in my arms and gurgling with love and with big wet eyes."

Barrie, in "Peter Pan," made millions of mouths water by his child's description: "Soft, damp cake."

Genius in advertising lies in brief analysis which creates instant and irresistible demand. The labored effort of the untalented professional cannot compare with the spontaneous coinage of sensitive, appreciative, honest and witty minds. The finest qualities in the advertising art are often native in bright children, whose wisdom is too often ignored by their elders.

Today I have added to my wealth a priceless treasure. To find it I did not have to dive to the bottom of the sea, nor blast the granite mountainside, nor drudge in field, quarry or mine, nor play a sharper's trick. I looked straight into man's clear eye, spoke a true word, received a signal of understanding and now, for life, I have a friend.

FREE AND EASY

WE are attracted by an address by A. W. Neally, of the Geyer-Dayton Company, at the world advertising convention at London, regarding methods by which the International Air Races to be held at Dayton in October are to be advertised. This gentleman said, according to the official report, that outdoor and novelty advertising would be used and also estimated that more than $1,000,000 worth of newspaper space would be obtained by the simple expedient of playing a fast press agent game. Oh, to be sure, every "story" sent to the newspapers would possess "news value," for a "regular newspaper man" would be employed to write the stuff. "No propaganda is to be sent out," said Mr. Neally, whatever he may have meant by the loose word "propaganda." The copy would have the "real news ring" and would be accepted, said he, confidently.

When Mr. Neally began to talk about his plans for outdoor and novelty advertising he spoke in straight commercial terms. There was no suggestion that the poster people could be depended on to furnish 24-sheet signs without compensation, nor novelty people supply children's skull caps, arm bands and pennants gratuitously. Only the newspaper could be counted on to freely yield space to promote this race.

Why not, when the very profitable game of baseball has been made a national sport by free newspaper publicity, when box fighting is made to yield millions to non-advertising promoters, indeed when any schemer may set a "regular newspaper man" to work to get for nothing $1,000,000 worth of advertising space

A. H. LUKER, editor of the Grapeland (Tex.) Messenger, the 1924 president of the Texas Press Association, took charge of his newspaper when he was 19 years old. Then he was called the youngest editor of a weekly newspaper in Texas.

A. H. LUKER

And what a newspaper!

The Messenger had been established March 1, 1899, with Dr. H. S. Robertson as first editor. The press and other equipment were crude hand affairs, and it was hard work indeed to turn out the four-sheet paper to the small subscription list.

But in 1905 Luker bought the handful of type and the other scant equipment, and by 1913 the subscription list was so built up, the advertising so increased, that he moved to a new office where he now occupies 2700 square feet floor space.

Luker joined the Texas Press Association in 1912 and has only missed one annual meeting since that year. He has served the association at various times as executive and on committees and was elected first vice-president last year at Galveston. Last April when Grapeland was incorporated, he was elected Mayor. His newspaper is a weekly 8-page all-home print, with a monthly 10-page magazine supplement, with extra page editions at special times.

WHAT'S WHAT IN THE FEATURE FIELD

WILL ROGERS, cowboy humorist, who wrote Democratic convention articles for the McNaught Syndicate, is credited with getting the first rise out of William G. McAdoo after the New York long distance party was over. There was much speculation by political writers as to just what Mr. McAdoo was going to do about the nomination of Mr. Davis. He refused to tell. Some thought he would play ball with the party and some thought he wouldn't.

On the Friday evening after adjournment he went to the Follies at the New Amsterdam Theater where Rogers is appearing and Will spotted him in the audience. Breaking into his comment on political events Rogers told the audience that Mr. McAdoo would address them and McAdoo made good. He arose and said he was leaving for Europe the next day but that "now that the convention was over we must all get together and make sure we elect a Democrat."

Will got more information out of him than any of the news men had been able to do.

A new radio feature for Sunday papers is "Listening In on the United States," by Robert D. Heinl, Washington, D. C. WASHINGTON PRESS CORPS DEPLOYED FOR CAMPAIGN EVENTS

Most Newspaper Bureaus Have Not Yet Assigned Men to Candidates, and Vacations Are the Rule After Ordeal With Democrats at Madison Square Garden

By SAM BELL

(Washington Correspondent, EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

FOR the most part members of the shattered corps of Washington correspondents who fell back on the capital last week with the ending of the Democratic National Convention, are seeking recuperation from what, by all odds, was the most fatiguing political assignment in the journalistic record books.

In twos and threes they have been appearing this week in Washington news haunts, so that the foyers, ante-rooms and corridors of officialdom again have taken on the semblance of normalcy. Newspaper plans for the campaign are beginning to take shape in some quarters, but at the best, the present is a kind of "in-between" period in which many of the reporters are A. W. O. L., or vacationing against the strenuous weeks that will begin in late August to run through to the November election day.

There has been no controversy about the New York convention which has just passed into history. Washington newspaper men, who bore the brunt of the grinding news days and nights, unanimously voted the affair a "killer," and not a few of them still wear visible signs of the strain.

Even the tireless James D. Preston, of the Senate press gallery, whose wiry frame and irrepressible disposition have given the laugh to many a trying situation, is not so good, and thus far has lacked the energy to resume his duties as major domo of the Rock Creek Park Golf Club.

On the whole, the long weeks it took the Democrats to nominate a ticket and the postponment of the formal notification of President Coolidge because of the death of his youngest son, means a late start all around. For that reason the newspapers and even the press associations have been slow to formulate campaign programs. The disposition has been to leave the Washington situation to the "home guard" who struggled to keep the Washington date line on the front page in the days of the New York dog-fall and the La Follette love feast in Cleveland.

The Associated Press, with the nine men of its Washington Bureau who were in New York back on the job, has decided in the main upon the campaign plan. James L. West, head of the Capitol staff, left Wednesday for New York, where he will pick up John W. Davis and trail him throughout the campaign. E. Ross Bartley, regular White House man, and Francis M. Stepheson, now on a vacation, will watch President Coolidge, while Paul F. Haupert, who covered the Progressive convention in Cleveland, will be assigned to Senator La Follette. L. J. Sullivan, of the Chicago office, who worked on the New York convention, will catch the Dawes assignment, and the activities of Governor Bryan probably will be covered by representatives in the Omaha bureau.

George R. Holmes, chief of the International News Service Bureau, will follow the Democratic nominee, and George Durno will look after the White House and the President. Kenneth W. Clark, who had a look-in all five conventions, Republican, Farmer-Labor, Democratic, Progressive and Socialist, will be with Senator La Follette. The vice-presidential nominees will be covered by the I. N. S. from bureaus in the middle west.

For the United Press, Fraser Edwards will do the honors with John W. Davis; Dale Van Every and A. L. Bradford, the White House and the President; and Paul R. Mallon, Senator La Follette. James Colbert, of the Chicago bureau, will look after the vice-presidential nominees. Raymond Clapper, of the United News, probably will turn up at Madison if La Follette settles down there for campaign, and Robert Bender of the New York office may be expected to do "situation" stories for the United Press.

According to present arrangements, Winder R. Harris will be with La Follette or John W. Davis for the Universal Service and Philip A. Orme with President Coolidge.

For the bigger special bureaus in Washington plans are more vague at the present time. Grafton S. Wilcox is expected to go with Davis for the New York Herald-Tribune, and Carter Field, for the same newspaper, will make the swing around to size up the situation in the various states. On the situation story, also, will be found David Lawrence, of the Consolidated Press; Richard V. Oulahan, New York Times; Arthur Sears Henning, Chicago Tribune; Robert Barry, Philadelphia Public Ledger; Louis Seibold, New York Evening Post; Walker Buel, Cleveland Plain Dealer; Clinton W. Gilbert, Philadelphia Evening Public Ledger; Roy Roberts, Kansas City Star; Charles G. Ross, St. Louis Post Dispatch; Charles Michelson, New York World; Robert M. Ginter, Pittsburgh Gazette-Times; Harry M. Price, Washington Post; J. Fred Essary, Baltimore Sun, and many others who will deal with the situation as it affects their papers more or less locally.

Direct contact with the candidates and possibly the vice-presidential candidates will be maintained by at least a dozen of the larger papers, once the main offices determine upon their campaign plans. For those assignments the Washington bureaus probably will be drawn upon for the majority of the men.

"FOR WHAT PURPOSE DOES THE GENTLEMAN ARISE"

Of the thousands of newspaper cartoons made during the national political conventions this one by John Cassel, of the New York Evening World, contains elements of humor and news which make it unique and widely discussed in newspaper circles. Doubtless the radio assisted in making this cartoon a huge hit, because of the public familiarity with the parliamentary phrase of the Democratic National convention, often repeated during the long siege at Madison Square Garden.

Holman Sells San Francisco Weekly to Samuel T. Clover

The San Francisco Argonaut, a weekly owned by Alfred Holman, has been sold to Samuel T. Clover, of Los Angeles. Holman now is editor of the San Francisco Bulletin. Clover publishes Saturday Night in Los Angeles. The papers will merge and be published simultaneously in both cities. The Argonaut was founded 48 years ago; Saturday Night 5 years ago. The suspension of the San Francisco Journal two weeks ago has caused a halt in the construction of California state highways. The Journal had a contract for advertising the bonds the legal number of times. The bonds ($3,000,000) were sold to a syndicate. The State Treasurer refuses to deliver the bonds because the Journal did not publish the advertisement the required number of times. The syndicate will bring suit.

Mrs. Shaffer Granted Alimony

Alimony of $30,000 a year was awarded to Mrs. Pauline Bullard Shaffer, July 9, when Judge Joseph Sabath at Chicago indicated he would grant her a divorce from Carroll Shaffer, general manager of the Chicago Evening Post and son of John C. Shaffer. The alimony was fixed by agreement. Trust funds aggregating about $300,000 have been established in Mrs. Shaffer's favor, with a provision that if the income falls below $30,000 a year Mr. Shaffer will make up the deficit. Mrs. Shaffer also obtained custody of the couple's three children.

RETAIL STORES LAUNCH EDUCATIONAL DRIVE

Seven St. Louis Firms Choose Dailies to Teach Public Constructive Retail Methods—Blumenstock in Charge

St. Louis, July 14.—Approximately $25,000 will be spent by 7 large retail stores of St. Louis on a newspaper advertising campaign which will have for its object the education of the public in honest and constructive methods of retail selling and advertising. The idea behind this co-operative effort is that consumers who understand the principles and methods of stores of the highest type will not become the prey of unscrupulous merchandising and advertising schemes. The campaign will be made up of 52 advertisements in each of two St. Louis newspapers, one an evening, the other a morning publication. Copy will be run on Monday in the morning paper and on Wednesday in the evening paper.

Louis Blumenstock, advertising counselor, (until recently advertising and sales manager of Stix, Baer & Fuller) is in charge of the campaign. Mr. Blumenstock was one of the organizers and first president of the Association of Retail Advertisers.

In his capacity as advertising counselor, Mr. Blumenstock will issue a monthly publication to be known as Blumenstock's Bulletin which will carry articles written by himself and staff advocating the stabilization of retail business through constructive advertising and selling.

In addition, Mr. Blumenstock will render a service for stores doing a business of from one to two million dollars annually, "which are lacking the talent necessary for the outlining of an advertising program on broad gauge principles."

forms the basis of international co-operation."

At the Monday afternoon session, Mr. Holland presided, and on the platform with him were the usual officers and Rt. Hon. Winston Churchill, Sir Philip Lloyd-Greame, M. P., former president of the Board of Trade; and Francis H. Sisson of New York.

Winston Churchill, booked to speak on "The Responsibility of Trade" enlivened the afternoon with an address that sparkled. He had been told all of his life, he said, that advertising was a gross breach of decorum; now he is reassured that it has become the first of the virtues.

HAROLD VERNON

Francis Sisson, a veteran of American advertising rostrums, was in his best form, his address on "Advertising the Creator of Standards in Business" being illustrated by many apt allusions.

Emerson's mousetrap maker he said must be brought together with his market by advertising, else he would starve albeit his mousetrap was the best in the world.

As to standards, he cited the case of an advertising campaign designed by a railroad president. "Much too florid, much too rosy" was the verdict of his staff, who compared the picture painted with the conditions as they knew them from inside.

"That copy stands," was the rejoinder of the boss. "Make the road live up to it."

Mr. Sisson was followed by Sir Lawrenec Weaver, who told the delegates of the art expositions at the Empire Exhibition. Then came Sir Charles Higham, whose rotund smile and command of oratory are almost essential to the success of an advertising convention in America these past few years.

"No other method of advertising is as valuable as the modern newspaper or periodical," said Sir Charles. "It is bought! It is read from cover to cover. It is alive. It is vital. It is dynamic and dramatic. It costs less to reach people effectively through its columns than by any other method—or, in fact by any method which is still to come. It is steadily improving in typography and illustration. Its advertisement columns are gaining greater respect. They are the market place of the world. They are the guide to the people as to what is new and worth buying. The influence of the modern newspaper and periodical has possibilities far greater than we have ever dreamed of."

The evening was spent in various ways. The A. A. C. W. officers held their annual general meeting and the joint assembly for the election of officers of the National Advertising Commission and the nomination of President of Secretary-Treasurer of the A. A. C. W. No officers were named by the National Commission, in the absence of a quorum to do business. Choice of dates for the 1925 meeting in Houston was left to the executive committee.

Tuesday's general session found another crowded house under the chairmanship of Lord Leverhulme, head of the great house of Lever Brothers, Ltd., supported by the Rt. Hon. Lord Kylsant, G. C. M. G., president of the London Chamber of Commerce; Sir Charles Higham, James D. Mooney, president of the General Motors Export Company, New York, and O. C. Harn, president of the Audit Bureau of Circulations.

Former Premier Baldwin added another to the long list of prescriptions of what the world needs today. His medicine is "good, honest, advertising between nations," so that the public, business men, and politicians and Governments might realize the true worth of each other. He suggested as a parallel organization to the League of Nations a league of honest advertising to maintain peace in the commercial world.

Mr. Baldwin said his term as Chancellor of the Exchequer had convinced him that advertising was necessary to business. Now that he had graduated to be a business director, he was working on this principle. He know what advertising had done in the United States, and he was out to follow that example and to see what it would do in England.

Sir Philip Lloyd-Greame then described his ideas on the chances for the development of advertising in Europe.

Mr. Mooney, spoke on the need for new leaders in the industrial world, who could undertake political power and work for the honest betterment of peoples. He saw advertising as a means of developing such leaders, and believed that the economic life of the nations would be benefited by advertising as time went by.

SIR CHARLES HIGHAM

Mr. Harn, the last speaker at the session, discussed "Essentials of Advertising Progress."

"The simple advertisement of yesterday had naught for its object but to announce," he said. "We used to call them announcements and our French members still so denominate their advertisements. Yesterday the advertising man assumed a desire, a demand, and in a simple and direct way sought to let people know where that demand might be satisfied.

"Today we go further. We seek through our advertisements to arouse desire, to create demand. Literature had long before experienced this distinction. Writers differed in their objectives. There was a wide divergence between the purpose of Gibbon in writing his 'History of the Roman Empire' and that of Victor Hugo in writing 'Les Miserables;' between the missions of Kant's 'Critique of Pure Reason's and Charles Dicken's 'Oliver Twist.'

"The writer of modern advertisements is a Charles Dickens, a Victor Hugo. He seeks to use every artifice of the pen to move men. He has created no new art. But he has seized upon every art which has been proved to be effective in moving men to action. Sometimes the modern advertiser loses sight of the thing which properly characterizes his art. His power is gone when he loses his militancy.

"But advertising is not just the writing of advertisements. This is the second big thing we have learned. Advertising is not even the printing of advertisements in pleasing typography, aided by good pictures intelligently selected. Advertising is influencing minds.

"It is in these purely modern aspects that our greatest development has come to pass. It is in these that our progress will lie. Advertising is an art which has its commercial considerations. We must excite desire at a minimum cost.

"The most important medium carrying advertising messages to the minds of men is the printed periodical. It is inevitably so, for the press many generations ago took its place as the chief means of influencing the minds of men.

The importance of the press to advertising and of advertising to the press has naturally led us to the most careful study of its use in advertising practice. Progress and development demanded it. The fundamental difficulty in using publications accurately arises out of the intangible nature of the thing for which the

WOMEN HAVE DIVINE SKILL FOR ADVERTISING

"WOMEN, everywhere are natural born advertisers," said Julia Coburn, publicity driector of the LaSalle & Koch Company, Toledo, addressing the Advertising Women's Conference. "From time immemorial, when women have met, they have discussed their possessions, their creations, their devices, their husbands, their children. Men, mingling more with the world, have always talked in abstractions—in ideas. Women, with their circumscribed lives, have talked things—concrete immediate things that go to make up the every day routine.

"Advertising can improve standards of living—it can change taste, and styles, and even habits. It can teach thrift, economy, careful purchasing. It can suggest wholesome recreation, encourage ambition and self-improvement—it can win a war or change a world. Have women no place in such a program?"

Investigation among Presbyterian churches indicates that very seldom does a specific advertising campaign of local church fail to bring into the church treasury more money than the advertisements cost, to say nothing of the increased attendance.

But in no case has this result come about when the advertisement carried merely the topic of the sermon and the name of the church.

Better advertising on behalf of all the churches in town is possible—and profitable, if the paper wishes it to be. Copy for such joint advertising may be had without charge from E. H. Harris, The Palladium, Richmond, Indiana.

advertiser pays his money. One buys merchandise and he can count it, weigh it, feel of its quality, test its strength. In buying periodical advertising what does one buy? White space? God forbid! We used to call it that. We buy the privilege of speaking to the minds of men and women. How many? What kind? Where? When? The buyer, singly, individually cannot examiner has purchase. This has been the greatest obstacle to using periodicals wisely for advertising purposes.

"'Ask the publisher, he knows.' This was once the only solution offered. That it was inadequate is clear upon the most superficial examination.

SIR HERBERT MORGAN

"In the first place, for a long time the publisher did not himself know. To the credit of the publisher be it said that he was among the leaders in correcting this state of affairs. The most far-seeing of his class saw that if advertising was to increase in effectiveness for the advertiser, the advertiser must be enabled to buy with discrimination. Also they saw that only under such conditions could the worthwhile publication draw to itself the advertising patronage it deserved. If the facts were not known there could not be any real comparison of values as between publications.

"Moreover, it was not altogether a question of honesty. One of the defects of the system of individual statements of circulation and other facts about periodicals was that there was no uniformity of language. Words and terms meant one thing to one publisher and quite another to others. There was no moral turpitude involved but the effect was the same.

"I am not fully informed as to how this matter of cooperative verification and circulation and other facts about periodicals stands in the other countries represented here but in the United States and Canada we have solved the problem. Ten years ago the situation was intolerable in these two North American countries. It was intolerable both for the advertiser and the worthy publisher. We solved it very simply. The publishers, the advertisers and the advertising agents joined together, worked out a set of uniform terms which formed an advertising Esperanto and jointly built an auditing machine which gets the facts about every cooperating publication for the benefit of all cooperators and advertisers generally. Auditors trained in the subtlties of circulation-getting methods go impartially into all details, not only in the publication offices but at distributing points. Not only the quantity of circulation but its character as revealed by many facts are set forth. Only the co-operation of the publishers themselves with the advertisers and agents makes the system possible. This co-operation is readily given because the publisher of the good advertising medium, the one whose methods are above reproach, is as great a beneficiary of non-partisan audits as the advertiser. This is not the time to go into details. Suffice it to say the system works and as an American advertiser I unhesitatingly place this accomplishment at the head in the march of advertising progress of the last ten years."

The delegates Tuesday night enjoyed the unique honor of attending a banquet given by the Associated British Advertising Agents in the ancient Guild Hall, in which the Guild merchants of olden times used to sit, and which is seldom used except for municipal functions of the highest importance.

The Lord Mayor, Sir Louis Arthur Newton, the principal speaker, recalled the history of Dick Whittington, thrice Lord Mayor of London, and his unique advertising agent, his famous cat. He said that this was the first time in history that this celebrated banqueting hall had been used to shelter a gathering of advertising men, self-confessed as such.

Stanley Resor, President of the Association of American Advertising Agencies, responded. The Americans particularly appreciated the occasion, and one New Jersey delegate recalled that an ancestor of his had, 200 years ago, presided over banquets as Lord Mayor.

The delegates who did not attend the Lord Mayor's banquet and who were not entitled to sit at the meeting of the club Presidents were entertained at a banquet given by the Society of British Advertisers. They numbered nearly 1,000 and were received by Viscount and Lady Burnham, Viscount and Lady Leverhulme, Lord and Lady Ashfield and Viscount and Lady Astor.

A free press and international peace as a result of advertising were urged by Edward A. Filene of Boston, in an address.

The cost of publishing the modern newspaper, Mr. Filene explained, far exceeds the returns from circulation or the price paid by readers and subscribers. Six million dollars a year—more than a million pounds—has become a very ordinary figure, he said, for "producing a great daily in our large cities."

H. H. CHARLES

"It is clear, therefore," he continued, "that the press is under an ever-increasing necessity of meeting competition by enormously expanding the sources of its revenues." Additional revenues are obtained by a "free press," he explained, principally by means of advertising. Those newspapers that are not "free," he declared, may obtain their additional revenues from "special interests." "In the long run," he warned, "there is no single factor more threatening to world peace than a press controlled by 'special interests.'"

Big advertising, the speaker said, might not always overcome the influence of "special interests" on the press; and on occasions and over short periods of time big advertising itself might attempt to control newspaper policy.

"But in the long run big advertisements can be paid for only by big sales," it was pointed out. "And big sales will not come unless readers have confidence that the paper can be relied on for its news and editorials.

"Big advertising is not an economic waste," the speaker continued. "It is a social service. It is more than that. It is the basis of a press that is financially free. It is the fundamental factor upon which depends the ability of the press to furnish facts disinterestedly and thus promote the outlook for world peace."

"Mass production is well under way in most countries of the world," declared Mr. Filene. "Trusts, both vertical and horizontal, which exist and are coming to the front in ever-increasing numbers, are in line with the best interests of social progress—even though at this pioneer stage they have all the faults of pioneering."

The speaker explained that mass production and mass distribution were inevitably dependent on mass selling and that the entire program was dependent on big advertising.

The speaker pointed out that advertising in the United States in 1923 reached the "amazing figure of $628,000,000. Advertising in the daily press

NATIONAL ADVERTISING—$300,000,000

"THE modern advertising agency has a responsibility in business that has grown to huge proportions in recent years. It is responsible for the vital promotion of the business of the manufacturer whose advertising it handles," said James O'Shaughnessy, executive secretary of the A. A. A. A.

"That was not true until very recently. Seven years ago the American Association of Advertising Agencies was formed for the purpose of bringing the better agencies together to counsel among themselves as to the best methods and practices in their work.

"In the seven years that have followed they have succeeded to almost revolutionary extent.

"In their hands the total of good national advertising has increased from about $80,000,000 to the unprecedented total of $300,000,000 for the current year.

"When the volume was at the smaller figure it was even then not so profitable to the advertiser, dollar for dollar, as it is today."

From Long Island to the Lakes

RIGHT now, New York State is in the midst of providing entertainment for hundreds of thousands of vacationists and tourists. Almost every mile of this great State has something to offer in the way of vacation lands.

It has miles of wonderful seashore, miles of beaches on the numerous lakes, it has mountains, forests, country and vacation cities with its resorts. New York State and its people are busy accumulating wealth.

"Even the woods and waves help to produce New York's wealth," somebody has said.

If you would "catch the eye" of hundreds of thousands of tourists and vacationists, who will in turn spread the fame of your product to the far corners of the entire United States, plan to place your advertising immediately in these daily newspapers.

There is no vacation period for the creators of wealth in this state. There is a constant demand for labor because New York-made products are recognized as the products of merit in all markets throughout the world.

Where there is so much industry there must be many dollars. And where there are so many dollars, there must be many sales.

To the wealth produced, must be added the great accumulations of money left here by the millions of vacationists who come to the mountains, lakes, forests, farms and seashore of the most wonderful state in the Union.

New York must head the list of every advertising campaign, if such a campaign is to be successful.

has grown by leaps and bounds—is growing—will grow at an increasing pace as we go on to meet the future."

"Geographically and climatically, there are very pronounced barriers which might easily have prevented any welding of the United States market," said E. T. Meredith, publisher of the Meredith farm publications, Des Moines, speaking on "How Advertising Has Welded the U. S. Market" at the Thursday session, presided over by Harold Vernon.

"Industrial production is largely concentrated in the northeastern quarter of the United States. For instance: Steel, largely produced in western Pennsylvania, with only one or two other areas contributing to the total production of approximately $4,000,000,000.

"In New England is a great textile section from which the total production of the country is approximately $5,000,000,000.

"In Michigan is the center of the motor vehicles (automobiles and trucks), having an annual value of $2,500,000,000. These three items show something of the concentration of industrial production.

"The great north central section raises considerably more than half of the meat and cereals produced in the country. The total meat production of the United States is $2,200,000,000, and cereals $3,800,000,000.

"The western states, supplemented by the production of Florida, produce most of the fruit, valued at nearly $70,000,000.

"The northwestern states produce most of the wool, valued at $27,000,000.

"How is national use possible in view of all these barriers? The answer, to my mind, is ADVERTISING.

"How has advertising done this?

"It has established brands or trade names nationally in the minds of the population.

"National advertising has established the standards which accompany the trademarked products.

"Consumers in every nook and corner of the United States have been given a definite knowledge of these widely advertised products.

"Advertising has established in the minds of the consumer the honesty of the product and its producer.

"Advertising has done this, because in carrying these messages and establishing in the minds of the consumers the brands and standards and knowledge and truth, it has given him confidence in the product, and 'confidence gained is a sale made.' With confidence established nationally, national sales naturally follow."

"Widespread and persistent advertising for the last forty years has made Canada an El Dorado to the European emigrant," said E. W. Beatty, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, addressing the convention Thursday morning.

"The question may arise—Has it been a wise policy to solicit new settlers by means of advertising? Would it not have been more prudent to allow the country to develop on lines of natural growth without this artificial or forced increase of population? The answer to that question is that unless we had advertised for and found virile and energetic people willing to come and help us develop our country, Canada would have become an incubus instead of an asset to the British Empire. Instead of being a prosperous, vigorous, self-reliant country, Canada would be known as a weak and anaemic neighbor of the United States, her chief usefulness to the Mother Country being as an occasional dumping ground for remittance men and undesirables. Instead of maintaining a well-equipped highway from Great Britain to her outposts in the Orient and Australia, the Canadian Pacific would be bankrupt and in disrepair, whereas owing to the settlement it has secured along its lines and its resulting financial strength, the Canadian Pacific was able from its own reserves to provide financial assistance in the form of loans and guarantees to the Allied Cause during the Great War to the extent of $100,000,000. The strength of Canada's position is peculiarly evident today, when, owing to economic circumstances, there is a considerable surplus population in the Eastern hemisphere ready to emigrate to the West."

Tuesday afternoon saw the opening of the Departments, and while these tied up a large number to Convention business, a goodly proportion found themselves at liberty to seek further amusement in the Exhibition or elsewhere. It was noticeable that many were simply collared by individual British hosts and hauled off to their homes for social intercourse and little jaunts to give the visitors the full flavor of British hospitality.

And as a New York Ad. Club man, resigning himself to such treatment, said to me "Say, is this sort of thing a habit with you folk? Because if it is, I'm coming again. It suits me."

To which the answer is "We'll larn you!"

WE'VE ONLY BEGUN

"SOME people seem to think we've reached the summit of endeavor. The fact is we've only just begun. We may fly in the air and move under the sea, so inventive is the modern brain; but we've not yet produced an entirely healthy, prosperous, clear and clean-thinking world, and until we have done that we've failed.

"Advertising is the quickest, most efficient way of accomplishing these ends, because its method is to startle, impress, educate, in the shortest space of time. Advertising has fostered more good habits than any other force. This statement is made without qualification of any kind."—Sir Charles Higham, at A. A. C. W., Wembley Convention.

Going out to lunch, the department store advertising manager handed a copy of "Poor Bob's Almanak" to his office boy, and told him to fertilize his mind a bit.

ART EXHIBITS DRAW CONVENTION CROWDS

Combined British and American Shows Will Tour Business Centers of United Kingdom After August 4

By HERBERT C. RIDOUT
(London Editor, EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

The advertising exhibits on view at the British Empire Exhibition have formed an important feature of the A. A. C. W. Convention Week, the comprehensive character of both British and American exhibits being such that they attracted considerable attention and afforded an interesting opportunity of comparing the respective methods employed, as well as the differences in copy and style, between the publicity of the two nations.

American exhibits are on view in the large gallery of the Stadium, which has been fitted with special lighting for the purpose. The exhibits consist of:

Original drawings and sketches by American artists.

Reproductions in colors by American lithographers.

Engravers' proofs and reproductions by American engravers.

Posters, showcards, labels, cartons, catalogs, booklets, and other examples of the work of American printers.

Newspaper and magazine advertisements, produced by American advertising agents and counselors and by American advertisers.

In addition to the American exhibits at the Stadium, there are shown in lifesize two units of poster advertising and one of painted display in construction and service in every detail upon the terrace, just above the main entrance to the Stadium.

The British exhibits of advertising art have been embodied in a special Exhibition of British Advertising Art and Painting, which the British Empire Exhibition has arranged to be held in the Palace of Arts, July 11 to August 4.

The exhibits include:

Original drawings and painting by British artists.

Engravers' proofs and reproductions by British blockmakers and engravers.

Posters, showcards, catalogs, booklets, labels, cartons, and other examples of the work of British printers.

Press advertisements, produced by British advertising agents and consultants and by British advertisers.

In addition to the exhibits in the Palace of Arts, two special hoardings have been erected in the space between the Palace of Arts and the Palace of Industry, on which selected posters, produced by British artists and printers will be shown. This will be called "Poster Street" and will become a permanent part of the Empire Exhibition.

After August 4, the American and British exhibits will be combined into one exhibition and sent to the principal business centers throughout Great Britain and Ireland.

Our Own World of Letters

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

THE editor of "Crain's Market Data Book and Directory of Class, Trade and Technical Publications" has completed his work on the fourth edition. He has produced a book that is even more valuable to the advertiser and the manufacturer by a number of changes which, in every instance, have been an improvement over former volumes. Some one, doubtless the editor, has seen to it that this remarkable collection of facts relating to markets has been so indexed that matter wanted is easily accessible.

This volume of over 500 pages testifies to the importance of the business and industrial press in this country. But the book is something more than a mere collection of statistics. It has valuable information about advertising and sales methods, and about buying habits and sales seasons of the various industries.

The amount of space devoted to statistics about class trade and technical publications is larger than ever. Advertising rates are given somewhat in detail and the sources of the circulation figures are plainly indicated. In addition to publications printed in the United States there are sections devoted to Canadian and other foreign business publications.

Of the value of this book to every marketing manager there can be no question. It is published by G. D. Crain, Jr., 537 South Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill.

OUR magazines now and then publish articles which attempt to portray present-day tendencies in the press. A typical one is "Our Newspapers Now —and Then," recently contributed to the Saturday Evening Post by Roy L. McCardell. Like similar articles to which I have called attention, this one views with alarm recent consolidations in the newspaper field and boldly asserts that it is the press agent who grabs most of the space once given to star and cub reporters' beats and scoops.

Of the part played by the press agent in newspaper production Mr. McCardell speaks as follows:

> So the press-agent cuckoo in the newspaper nest has thrown out the star reporter and the cub, and the demon city editor followed after. But to many magazine editors the newspaper story of the supercilious star reporter whom the despised cub outshines in securing the scoop, while the demon city editor barks at them both, is still dear as it was in the days of Richard Harding Davis. The magazines are still supplied with the rococo romances of the city room, mainly by press agents, who, as they say, write fiction in their spare time.
> Alas, the cub reporter is now the harried and hustled leg man. The star reporter has gone on the copy desk or has been relegated to rewriting. He puts in his eight hours a day chopping adjectives out of publicity matter.

Criticism of propaganda and press agents—enough and to spare—has been printed—so far as personal opinion is concerned. What is wanted is some one to take an issue of a metropolitan daily and prove his case by marking, column by column, what is the work of the press agent and what is the work of the reporter. Let the facts speak for themselves.

I have just been glancing through the New York papers and have been studying somewhat carefully the reports of the political convention. I have tried conscientiously to separate the wheat of the newspaper reporter from the chaff of the candidate's press agent. I may not be a good judge, but of the latter's work I can only find "traces" of impurity in the news —to borrow the chemist's phrase in his analysis of water. An honest difference of opinion may obtain whether certain stories are news or propaganda. But this so-called propaganda, I find on investigation, comes from men who are in the employ of the newspaper and not in the employ of the candidates for the nomination.

I hold no briefs for press agents. But I do wish the press agents of the anti-propaganda campaign would adopt that excellent motto of the news room, "Accuracy First."

Some editorial writer on a newspaper ought to use a half-column or so on the topic "Our Magazines—Now and Then." Personally, I regret that periodicals of enormous circulation have driven out those smaller magazines which had so much charm and personality behind them.

If the modern daily newspaper has no use for the reporter he ought to find a comfortable chair on the editorial staff of a magazine. Has the magazine editor any mortgage upon features which bring circulation? Has any political convention produced any finer examples of political reporting than can be found in the newspapers of the present month? Was there ever a time when the reporter was given such freedom to sign good stuff as today? Would any of the New York papers, whatever might be the opinion of the editorial page, refuse to print the statements of all candidates?

I am open to conviction, but I still would like facts rather than personal opinion to show me that newspaper publishers have turned their papers over to press agents. It would be an interesting experiment to have the next magazine editor wishing an article about the press instruct his contributor to keep to facts and omit editorial comment—such instructions as a city editor gives to a reporter. A good news story about newspapers would make interesting reading.

Some of the tendencies mentioned by Mr. McCardell are to be regretted. Publicity has taken from the press many able men. But the high moral regard with which they were held by newspaper associates cannot be displaced by a clever, satirical paragraph. It yet remains to be proved that these former newspaper men have sold their birthright for a mess of pottage.

The rapidity with which great financial and industrial corporations have added publicity men to the payroll is startling. But this fact may simply be a reflection of the radical change in business from "the public be damned" to "the public be informed." Newspaper editors are cynical and sophisticated. They may be using, but I question whether they are being used by press agents.

McNULTY, who has been connected with various newspapers in Bridgeport and New London, Conn., as well as in New York and Boston, has an article in the Current History Magazine for July on "The Demand for Secession in Canada's Maritime Provinces." CHARLES AUSTIN BATES, who was a pioneer in writing about advertising, has just published "Does Advertising Pay the Consumer?" Briefly, the pamphlet is made up of twenty-six short talks on advertising which Mr. Bates syndicated in a number of daily newspapers. Many will be glad to have these talks in a permanent form.

On the subject of newspaper advertising Mr. Bates remarks in his introduction:

> When the conditions of a business are such that newspaper advertising can be applied, it offers the broadest, quickest, most flexible, most economical method of getting a message into the minds of the people.
> Newspaper advertising is not always applicable, but it must always be considered.

Mr. Bates is very modest when he says that his excuse for this small book is his belief that many people, not only advertisers, but also consumers, will not be harmed by a reminder of the A B C's of advertising.

THE KEY TO ILLINOIS AND HER MARKETS is the merchandising and advertising departments of these daily newspapers.

It is an ideal tryout territory for nationally advertised goods and you can't make believe you're covering Illinois in a national campaign by the use of national mediums alone.

To get the full benefit of the almost limitless market that Illinois offers, you have to use the Illinois Daily Newspapers. They, and they alone, put you in direct touch with the market.

These Illinois dailies reach the homes of people in Illinois. They tell these people what the home merchants have to sell. They form the point of contact between the buyer and the seller. They function every day—regularly.

The merchandising and advertising departments of these listed daily newspapers will gladly furnish detail reports regarding market possibilities specifically and in general.

CHURCH AS A BUSINESS A. A. C. W. TOPIC

Appraisal and Reorganization Needed, Says Cherington—Brown and Oswald Discuss Use of Advertising

"In America we use all forms of advertising in church promotion work. They include newspaper advertisements, posters, street car cards, printed circulars sent through the mail and distributed by hand to residents and to passersby in the street; bulletins, announcements, etc.," said John Clyde Oswald, publisher, the American Printer, addressing the Church Advertising Department.

"A great church outside the churches of the United States" was pictured by James W. Brown, publisher of EDITOR & PUBLISHER, in his address on "Space for Church Advertising in Newspapers."

His statistics showed that only 40 per cent of the population of the United States profess church affiliations, but that practically 100 per cent of the population expressed their confidence in the daily newspapers by their regular and continued patronage. The newspaper was obviously the gateway to the hearts of the 60 per cent who are not regular church attendants. Space for a church advertising campaign should be ample for presentation of the Christian message, Mr. Brown advised, and should be used on a regular schedule, not spasmodically nor only on special occasions.

"The task of the church as it is today, and as it has always been, is not selling but giving," said Paul Cherington, director of research of the J. Walter Thompson Co. "This makes a sharp contrast at the very outset between the work of modern business and the work of the church. The relations between the Church and the people not only are intensely personal, but they do not involve the idea of an adequate, measurable quid pro quo.

"There are four main groups into which the work of reorganization of the church would naturally fall. The first probably is the application of modern standards of business to its work. A system of scientific accounting which would enable the church to know where it stood financially, certainly ought to come in any attempt to reorganize.

"In the second place under business standards there would come the application of modern principles of organization, not only for mobilizing the talent of the general body, but mobilizing the forces of the community in relation to the Church. Certain estimable evangelists have been teaching during the last few years something of what could be done by careful organization.

"The third step would be an adjustment of the product of the market. I am one of those who believes that with the rise in average intelligence the world is nearly ready for an appeal to men's minds in connection with matters of religion, and that the time for talking down to the people in religious affairs is past.

"After all these things are done we come to the fourth, and what may be called the last stage—that is advertising—setting before the people in the right way the right message concerning a product and a producer and an equipment which beforehand had been made as right as possible."

"During the last three years the Church Advertising Department of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World has been a constructive force in urging on churches and on newspapers the use of copy which attempts to persuade non-churchgoers to go to some church, it matters little which one, and thus to raise the whole level of thinking of the community," said Herbert H. Smith, of the Publicity Department of the Presbyterian Church. "Newspapers have responded in numbers to this effort.

"The Work of the Church Advertising Department of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World in taking the message of better advertising in newspapers has been tremendously helped by the co-operation of EDITOR & PUBLISHER, the leading American paper for newspaper makers. By the donation of space in this weekly publication the Department has been able to suggest for the last two years definite plans whereby newspaper publishers can enlarge their community influence by co-operating with their local churches."

USE PAPERS AND POSTERS, SAYS LATTER'S SPOKESMAN

"TODAY, if a national advertiser is seeking massed sales in the cities and towns of America, there are two methods of intensive advertising open to him," said Clarence B. Lovell, Advertising Manager, Poster Advertising Company, Inc., addressing the Poster Advertising Association and the London Bill Posters Association at the international convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World. "I refer, of course, to Newspapers and Posters. The two mediums have much in common. Both are flexible. They can be used just ahead of salesmen, or right on their heels. Both represent millions of invested capital. Both are large customers of other industries—the Newspaper of presses, paper and ink—the Poster of metal, lumber, paper, ink, lithography, etc.

"I have touched on the similarities of these two mediums of advertising. The difference, as I see it, is this—Newspaper Advertising gives the logic and argument ('reason why' if you like), and Poster Advertising contributes the powerful suggestive value of color—a picture—and three or four words pregnant with meaning. No wonder that these two work so well when they are harnessed together."

TEXAS ALREADY BUSY ON 1925 WELCOME

Houston Will Remodel Auditorium for General Sessions of A. A. C. W.—$100,000 in Hand for Entertainment of Delegates

By M. E. FOSTER
Publisher of the Houston Chronicle
(Exclusive Telegram to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

HOUSTON, TEX., June 16—Houston has already received advertising of the greatest value in connection with the annual meeting of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World. The name of Houston and its port have been impressed upon the minds of millions of newspaper readers. They know more today of Texas history and of Texas development they know more about our great crops and our vast oil interest.

Now that the next convention has been unanimously awarded to Houston, our next job is to get ready. It's a big thing we have agreed to undertake. We will entertain several thousand delegates, representing big business and many forms of advertising. In London the delegates were entertained in a most hospitable and lavish maner. Last year it was Atlantic City that had the great gathering. The year before it was Milwaukee. Each city has been a remarkable contrast.

Houston will be entirely different from the other three, but its entertainment of the delegates will be on the same big scale. Fortunately we already have ample hotel accommodations. The big city auditorium is to be remodeled for the general meetings and several smaller halls will be ready for the departmental gatherings. There was no need to ask such a big gathering of brainy, enterprising men to come here from all parts of the world unless we could give them ample accommodations. We can do it. We will.

For the proper entertainment of our guests our city will raise a fund of $100,000. We have already told them of Houston's hospitality and of the desire of our citizens to properly greet the delegates to the next convention. We must fulfill every promise to do more. We must prove that Houston is the South's greatest city, and that her citizenship appreciate the great gathering that will assemble here.

"Publishing in the United States has attained to unexampled heights; and that is also true of the advertising agencies," said Newcomb Cleveland, vice-president of the Erickson Company, New York, addressing a meeting of the American Association of Advertising Agencies and the Association of British Advertising Agents.

"While these advertising agencies who have built up such effective organizations, generally for promotion and development of advertising, the name 'advertising agency' is beginning to be regarded as somewhat of a misnomer. They are being regarded now as marketing engineers, and actually, advertising which is the basis of their operations is in effect only a part of their work. While they are the agents of the publishers, they are also employes of the advertiser, very much as a lawyer might be who is employed to direct certain phases of affairs.

"The work they do for the publisher is selling his space as it always was and making the use of the space profitable to the advertiser."

MAGNIFICENT — WANAMAKER

"If the founder of this business were here today he would acclaim your great convention as a distinct forward step in that merchandising and advertising progress to which his life was devoted. Can anything bring the peoples of the world more closely together than a common recognition of the ethics and standards of their mutual business relations which must be a part of everybody's life. In the accomplishment of all of this your great organization is doing magnificent work.—RODMAN WANAMAKER.

CAMBRIDGE
EMMANUEL COLLEGE

Cambridge is a sleepy little market town dating back to the time of the Romans. Its colleges are, of course, world famous, but that of most interest to Americans is probably Emmanuel, the Puritan College, known as the Mother of American Universities. Here, those who afterwards became leaders of the pilgrims were trained for the ministry. John Robinson, Zachariah Symmes, John Cotton, Samuel Whiting, Thomas Hooker, John Harvard — these are among the seventy divines who had their training at Emmanuel, and subsequently took so large a part in the founding of the Puritan Colony at Plymouth, Mass., from whence the great American nation sprang. To visit the beautiful old city of Cambridge, therefore, becomes a duty as well as a pleasure to every keen American.

F. E. GANNETT ISSUES NEW A. P. BRIEF

New York State Publisher Replies to Hearst Book With Additional Argument in Membership Proxy Contest

Frank E. Gannett of Rochester Times-Union this week sent to all Associated Press members a 14-page booklet, written by him in response to the booklet recently broadcast to the same membership by William Randolph Hearst, as an additional argument in the contest of Rochester Times-Union, together with Baltimore Evening Sun, to obtain Associated Press memberships, which applications are protested by Mr. Hearst's Baltimore News and Rochester Journal and Post Express, the Associated Press to decide the issue in a "proxy convention" on July 31.

Mr. Gannett says that the Hearst Organization brief made two points, as follows:

"1. Mr. Hearst says he has large property interests in Baltimore and Rochester that would be impaired in value if these memberships were granted.

"2. Mr. Hearst says that to grant them would establish a bad precedent."

Mr. Gannett denies the contention that ownership by Mr. Hearst of International News Service is not involved in the issue and declares: "This is the outstanding, vital fact in the whole situation."

The Gannett booklet then reads: "Why? Because the force and validity of both of Mr. Hearst's points depend upon his loyalty and unreserved interest in the welfare of the Associated Press. And it seems too clear to be doubted that Mr. Hearst, the newspaper publisher, cannot be loyal and unreservedly interested in the Associated Press, as a member, while Mr. Hearst, the owner of a competing news service, exploits that service as greatly superior to the Associated Press, and sells it to his clients on the basis of such claims.

"The answers to Mr. Hearst's two points are very simple:

"1. Mr. Hearst has a right to hold unimpaired his property interest in the Associated Press afternoon fields in Baltimore and Rochester only on the assumption that his newspapers in those fields are giving the Associated Press that kind of member loyalty and member service that warrant their continuance in exclusive control of their fields.

"Membership in the Associated Press is not an unconditional gift in perpetuity from the corporation. It is a reciprocal obligation. On the member's part, it is based—and in justice to all can only fairly continue—on a loyal and undivided service from the member to the corporation. That we do not believe the Associated Press is receiving from Mr. Hearst as a member in either Baltimore or Rochester.

"2. If the foregoing is true—as we honestly and sincerely believe it to be—then it follows, as a matter of course, that to give memberships in the afternoon field in Baltimore and Rochester to newspapers that would ably and truly and loyally serve the Associated Press and its members would be to establish a good precedent, instead of a bad precedent."

Mr. Gannett then argues the two points in detail. He recites his view of the International News Service — Associated Press ownership of news case, charges that the suit cost the latter $100,000 and asks: "Had Mr. Hearst been successful, of how much value would your membership in the Associated Press have been?"

Follows a review of the Oakland Examiner Associated Press case, as seen by Mr. Gannett, and asks: "Did the Oakland Tribune have property rights in its Association Press membership," and "Did the action of Mr. Hearst and his San Francisco Examiner 'constitute an unjustified impairment' of those property rights? Mr. Hearst's book says it is a question of whose ox is gored. Sometimes it is. Whose ox was gored when the Associated Press spent several hundred thousands of dollars in fighting the 'Common Carrier' case against William Randolph Hearst, in the 'Property in News' case against his International News Service, and the 'Oakland Edition' case against his San Francisco Examiner?"

Mr. Gannett declares that he entered his application for Rochester Times-Union membership "at the urgent request of members of the Associated Press, friends of mine, who insisted that it was my duty to do so in order to protect the general membership of the association from Hearst control of the afternoon field in Rochester." He says he greets with skepticism "Mr. Hearst's newly discovered interest in the welfare of the other members of the Associated Press." Here is a sentence from the book: "If Mr. Hearst's power in the Associated Press grows to the point where he controls many more important centers of news gathering and news distributing, so that the Associated Press service from those cities becomes a Hearst Service, your property rights in the Associated Press won't be worth a tinker's dam!"

Discussing the claim made for Mr. Hearst that his newspapers in Rochester and Baltimore now have the best organizations in the history of those papers, at the disposal of the Associated Press, exclusively, Mr. Gannett asks: "Where does the I. N. S. get its service out of Baltimore and Rochester?"

He says that a fight against the Hearst papers for expulsion would mean prolonged and expensive and difficult litigation for Associated Press members, with facts hard to prove in court.

In conclusion he asks A. P. members who "feel as I do about the Hearst methods, and their danger to the Associated Press," to "vote with us."

For the Hearst General Management Victor H. Polachek this week said to EDITOR & PUBLISHER: "We have no additional statement to make; the matter was clearly stated in our book."

NEWSPRINT PRODUCTION UP

Total Output in Past 6 Months 3 Per Cent Above 1923

Newsprint production for the first 6 months of 1924 for U. S. and Canadian mills totalled 1,425,487 tons, of which 750,338 tons were produced by United States mills and 675,149 tons were made in Canada. The increase in total North American production is about 3 per cent over the corresponding period for last year, while Canadian production shows an increase of about 8 per cent. American production is off about 1 per cent. The figures are taken from the report of the Newsprint Service Bureau, New York.

Observers of newsprint conditions believe these figures indicate that the Canadian production will surpass the U. S. mills' total by the end of the year, unless there is considerable curtailment across the border. A number of American mills have gone off production in the last few weeks. American production in January was 129,685 tons; in June, it was 120,723 tons; Canadian January production was 109,875 tons and in June it was 107,667 tons. Shipments of newsprint ran about 11,000 tons behind production.

New Ad Methods Built Paint Company's Sales Preceding Deal

Controlling interest in the Devoe and Raynolds Company, Inc., New York, manufacturers of paints and varnishes, was taken over this week by 16 employes. All of them are young men, none being more than 40 years of age. E. S. Phillips, new president of the company is but 31.

The transfer of the stock was made on July 1.

Due to the new policy of advertising and the modern methods of merchandising adopted by the younger generation, a statement by the company said, its sales have doubled in the past 5 years, at an annual increase of about 25 per cent.

ONE OF THE SMALLEST IN SIZE

West Virginia

Not such a big area on the map of the United States—BUT a mighty big area on the map of the space buyer.

The population of approximately 1,500,000 averages about 50 persons to the square mile.

There is no great dominating population center in West Virginia such as is found in other states of the east, that are rich in natural resources. There is no one dominating center.

The chief distributing and newspaper centers are strategically situated and cover the state with merchandise and news.

One of the Greatest in Wealth

West Virginia is the home of essential industries. It possesses vast supplies of cheap fuel—coal, oil and gas and tremendous potentialities for hydro-electric power.

The wealth, that has come from West Virginia hills, has been poured back into her cities with the result that every one of her cities can boast of homes and temples of business that are the equal of those of any other state in the Union.

COLOR ADS FOR DAILIES NEAR PERFECTION

his plates to obtain the desired effect of printing done wet as against his former methods of printing one color at a time and letting each color dry between printings. The screens used for this work differ somewhat for wet and dry printing; for instance, a 120-line screen will resemble closely a 133-line screen printed in multi-color, for the reason that the dot is hitting wet pigment and there is a little closer blend to the dot than when printed dry and separately. The effect, however, is very pleasing and distinct.

"Multi-color printing also has a classification practically all its own. It is not quite as soft and dull as that which is known as offset printing, nor has it the shine or sheen of dry printing.

"When the photo-engraver is etching plates for multi-color purposes he must be provided with a proof press which will prove these various colors simultaneously the same as they are printed on the multi-color presses. This involves some very intricate automatic machinery which permits the proofer to register flat plates, ink them in their respective colors and take a cylinder impression almost instantly while the ink is freshly applied. This machine permits the proover also to print the various colors in different sequence; for instance, he can print in the order of black, yellow, red, blue, or yellow, red, blue and black; or any other selection of color sequence he wishes to try. If his tone value is not in the plate, he re-etches or corrects his plate and prooves again until he has a perfect multi-color plate. The plates must be entirely satisfactory before they are sent to the electrotyper.

"The use of the proof press also permits the operator to mark on his progressive proofs the exact formula of inks, or any corrections that were made in these inks, so that all colors may be ground properly in the ink department. We are now able to send plates into the pressroom that have actually been tested.

"The newspaper field has the greatest distribution of advertising in the world. Color has attracted the newspapers and our greatest field of endeavor points in that direction, and I predict that within a short period of time the newspapers will not only distribute a weekly colored magazine with beautiful color prints, but you will also see color used in the newspapers which are distributed on our streets daily."

"Obviously it is advertising that covers a people, and, therefore, one of the most efficient types of national advertising is newspaper advertising, for only newspapers reach the full depth as well as the breadth of nations," said W. E. Donahue, local display advertising manager of the Chicago Tribune.

"The big reason why the newspaper is a great national advertising medium is because newspaper advertising can be tied up close with sales work through the co-operation of the merchandising service rendered by the great American dailies.

"The test of the medium is not the volume of circulation alone—but how much circulation—what kind of circulation—how much buying power and how much responsiveness."

"The tabloid newspaper idea did not originate in the United States, it originated right here in London and today tabloid newspaper owners are still looking to the British Empire for many of the new ideas which they incorporate in their newspapers," said Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr., tabloid newspaper owner, before the newspaper men.

"There was a time a very few years ago when those who were interested in the development of a large town would always mention, among other things, the fact that such and such a paper published in that city contained a superlative or near-superlative number of pages. It is not expecting too much of the near future to believe that the sons of these men will point to a paper with a comparatively insignificant number of pages and say that it gives all the worth-while news in the world every morning condensed to such a point where the busy man on his way to the office or to lunch will be able to keep in touch with the world. Instead of columns of verbiage he will find a few paragraphs of colorful facts, into which has been condensed all that was meant to be said in the long article. Instead of massive headline, destined to awe him into giving attention, he will find a short dynamic line, which in itself will tell much of the story."

Attendance at the departmental sessions ranged from 50 to 200, and the newspaper, agency, and national advertiser meetings averaged about 150 at every session. Col. E. F. Lawson, London Daily Telegraph, and George M. Burbach, St. Louis Post-Dispatch, presided at the newspaper sessions.

Other prominent speakers on the newspaper department program were Sir Andrew Caird, London Daily Mail; Louis Wiley, New York Times; Sir James Owen, Exeter Express; William H. Rankin, New York; E. LeRoy Pelletier, Detroit; J. C. Kirkwood, London; James Gourlay, B. S. C., J. P., Glasgow Herald; James Heddle, London Daily Sketch; Lord Riddell, News of the World; Sir Stanley Reed, Times of India; John R. Scott, Manchester Guardian, and President Holland.

TRUTH CAMPAIGN WORLD-WIDE—HOOVER

The London Convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World marks a farther step in the elevation of the fundamental principles of business and a distinct advance in the world fight for "Truth in Advertising."

Moreover, such an international conference will undoubtedly extend its influence beyond the field of advertising. Broader knowledge, fuller understanding, and common appreciation among business men of each other's problems and viewpoints in all phases of human activity are sure to dull the sharp edges of traditional prejudices, and stimulate friendly trade relations through which peace and prosperity are firmly established. I wish the conference the best of success.—Herbert Hoover.

LIEUT. LOWELL H. SMITH, commander of the American globe-circling air squadron, was given the following resolution by the committee from the convention:

"Nearly three hundred in the delegation of the Advertising Club of New York now in London at the 20th Annual Convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of World greet you and most heartily compliment you on the epoch-making achievement of your world flight arrival at Croydon Field, London. You bring the spirit of pioneer America. Your 1,700 fellow citizens in advertising here at Convention and the many thousands of fellow Americans sojourning in British Isles applaud in your winning of these victories of peace. May your demonstration bring to the thought of mankind a realization of ease by which all nations can work in harmony, and may your arrival coincident with convening of a conference of European leaders on the reparation problems give to those gentlemen added enthusiasm for a successful attainment of their objectives."

IT is a good time to feature electrical equipment for the household, during these Summer days, to facilitate work and make it possible for the housewife to enjoy more time outdoors. There are vacuum cleaners, electric stoves (less heat), washing machines, electric ironers and the electric sewing machine to lessen the task of preparing and altering the wardrobe for the vacation trip.

These are days of blissful forgetfulness, but one must look ahead and plan for the cosy home in the Fall. August sales for furniture, with storage inducements, would help people decide now.

Many people prefer to go bareheaded in Summertime, but the sun soon teaches them that it is Midsummer madness and no doubt they would welcome some suggestions about cool caps, shade hats, parasols and umbrellas.

Those who have dreamed about "hobbies" and have decided to make them realities on this vacation trip might want some advice about fishing tackles, rubber boots, golf outfits, tennis rackets and riding habits.

The Fort Wayne (Ind.) News-Sentinel, runs two ads of the same size every day on the page where its real estate ads appears. These two ads are from the traction company and the city light and power plant and both of them solicit business. Aare YOU getting all the advertising you should get from the local public utilities? And couldn't you hook up such ads more successfully with the building operations in the city?—Frank H. Williams, Fort Wayne.

One of the neglected fields of advertising in cities where the Sunday morning edition has a large country circulation is that of mercantile houses catering to parcel post customers. Regular advertisers can be induced to take extra space on special "Parcel Post" pages as it makes an especial appeal to a class of readers who do not react to the usual ads where the suggestion of shopping by mail is absent. Weekly merchandise features for parcel post customers offered through such ads should also be suggested to houses, such as local mail order establishments and smaller stores, not regularly using space.—A. N.

An Iowa newspaper has started a contest to see who is the oldest subscriber to its publication. When the contest is over, the newspaper advertising department will have a nice list to show advertisers in order that they may know that people like the paper so well that they take it for several decades. —Donald O. Ross, Washington (Ia.) Democrat.

During the Elk's National Convention in Boston recently daily newspapers in that city pulled many a dollar of advertising revenue with a classified section entitled, "Where to Park Your Car" or a similar heading. With traffic congestion steadily growing more of a problem, this is worth trying anywhere where an unusually large number of visitors throng the city, and the results are likely to surpass expectations.—F. F. L.

As a courteous welcome to convention delegates, or visitors to celebrations which will attract a number of persons to your town, why not get up a heading such as THE LATCH STRINGS ARE OUT AT—and have the lunch rooms, hotels and retail stores contribute special ads catering to the visitors?—C. M. Littlejohn, Washington, D. C.

"What you don't know about my business," was good for little stories and some advertising contests. The interviews were personal and impersonal. The writeup and ads made up a page.—L. J. Jellison, Dubuque (Ia.) Times Journal.

Utilize pre-election campaigns in your circulation promotion plans. Solicit candidates for wholesale numbers of editions in which their speeches are published; many of them will want to mail out copies to their constituency. A good circulation stunt, also, would be to run a series of personality sketches of the men—and women—who are running for office. Most of them, doubtless, will order many extra copies on the days when they are featured. Newspapers with job printing plants may also use this idea for handbills.—David Resnick, St. Louis Times.

The French bob, the shingle, "La Garconne," permanent waves and other styles of hair dressings for women, under a ribbon "Coiffures Artistiques," furnished a very attractive display in a Washington (D. C.) paper last week. Under this banner were grouped many ads from shops specializing in modern hair dressing and hair cutting.—C. M. Littlejohn, Washington, D. C.

Black's, a Waterloo, Ia., department store, in the Tribune on the occasion of their 32nd anniversary ran a full page featuring 140 pieces of silks at various prices and a special anniversary discount on remainder of stock. The idea was carried out in the entire ad featuring all departments. It was unique and a puller in novelty advertising.—L. J. Jellison, Dubuque (Ia.) Times Journal.

Shake-Up On Baltimore News

A shake-up on the Baltimore News this week left 15 vacancies on the editorial staff. Some of the men were released, others resigned. Among the latter were some of the oldest men on the paper in point of service, men who had been with the Munsey organization before Hearst bought the News and the American, including Warren Wilmer Brown, critic of art and music for more than 10 years, Edward Green, telegraph editor for almost as long a time, Hammond Brown of the sporting department. Richard D. Steuart, city editor, was transferred to the rewrite desk. "Will" Wayne becomes city editor in addition to news editor.

Rubber Industry Advertising

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER: I want to assure you of our appreciation of the splendid article by Hammond Edward Franklin in the June 21 issue of EDITOR & PUBLISHER on the Crepe Rubber Sole.

Under the cut of the ad which you illustrated you say "British copy for the rubber industry, which is now being duplicated in American newspapers." This statement is not the fact. This advertising campaign is planned entirely and executed entirely by the Dorland Agency, Inc., of New York. It is also true that the Rubber Growers Association Inc., is a client of our London Office, Dorland Advertising Agency, Ltd., of Regent street, London. However, one of the principles on which we do business is where an advertising campaign is to be on in a country it must be planned and executed in that country.

It would be preposterous to layout, plan and execute a campaign for the British Rubber Growers Association in England. It must be done in this country if it is to be carried on.—R. A. PORTER, Dorland Agency, Inc.

Houston Press 13 Years Old

Through a typographical error in EDITOR & PUBLISHER for June 21st it was recorded that Houston Press, Houston, Texas, was established September, 1916 This should have been September, 1911. Milwaukee Daily Plans Radio Show

Air mail service and radio were both recently used by the Milwaukee Journal to advertise its forthcoming radio show. LA CROSSE TRIBUNE'S FINE NEW OFFICES

F. W. Burgess Receives 6,000 Fellow Citizens in Remodeled Building—New Equipment for Thriving Daily

WHAT F. W. Burgess, publisher of the La Crosse (Wis.) Tribune, calls the feat of "changing a sow's ear into a silk purse" was successfully completed on Friday, June 27, when the Tribune opened to the public—6,000 of them—its newly remodeled building. The plant was originally erected for a wholesale plumber, was bought by the Tribune seventeen years ago, remodeled to some extent five years later, and has now been completely converted into a thoroughly modern newspaper plant.

F. W. Burgess

Until this year the Tribune occupied only the ground floor and a one-story annex, which was built to house the composing room in the first remodeling a dozen years ago. This year the Tribune expanded to occupy all three floors of the building, and turned the composing-room annex into a pressroom.

A 48-page Scott multi-unit sextuple press with a capacity of 36,000 papers an hour, was installed, and the Tribune signalized the opening of the building by printing a 48-page edition. A feature of this paper was a three-page section devoted to personal sketches of every man and woman on the staff, accompanied by a half-column cut of each. The sketches were written in a complimentary, rather personal vein, and each described the individual's particular job on the paper.

The building was rebuilt literally from cellar to garret during the six months taken by the remodeling, and during that time the Tribune was published every day and Sunday under, over and through a mighty mess made by carpenters, masons, electricians, press mechanics, movers, plasterers and other varieties of building workmen. The staff heaved a mighty sigh of relief when the last painter was out of the building the day before the opening, and Frank Burgess left two days later for a trip to the Associated Ad Clubs' convention in London, as soon as the opening was over.

The business office on the ground floor of the new Tribune plant is about doubled in size, taking over the space formerly used for the press. The publisher's office was turned into a handsome rest-room for the women members of the force. A carrier's room and a file-room are also on the ground floor, as well as the pressroom, stereotype, foundry and mailing room. The second floor is devoted to the composing room and editorial rooms, which latter are twice the size of the older editorial offices and include a suite of four rooms, the big city room and smaller offices for the editor, Mark R. Byers, the Associated Press and the society and woman's page editors. It is divided from the composing room by a glass partition which may be opened, getting a sweep of ventilation from end to end of the building. The building has light from all four sides, and is one of the lightest and most airy plants that could be imagined. Modern steel furniture was installed throughout the composing room, and the business office was also completely refurnished to match the dark oak paneling of the lobby and woodwork.

Publishers from five states attended the opening, and were guests of the Tribune at a supper at the leading hotel of the city in the evening. The building was crowded all day by local visitors.

MACFADDEN'S DAILY TO APPEAR SOON

Magazine Publisher Confirms Report He Will Issue New Tabloid Evening Paper—To Be "Radically Different"

Bernarr Macfadden, publisher of Physical Culture and other magazines, in a statement this week confirmed reports that he had purchased the plant of the old New York Evening Mail and intended to start publication of a daily illustrated tabloid in New York within the next few weeks. It is understood the paper will appear evenings.

The mechanical equipment of the Mail plant is being overhauled and a staff is being engaged.

According to Macfadden the daily will differ radically from other papers.

"For more than 40 years I have read, studied and criticized daily newspapers," he declared. "The majority of them are not unlike a factory brand of shoes, all alike made in the same mould controlled by the same oldtime wornout prejudice.

"You must know what the readers want; you must dramatize the news and features in such a manner that they will not only interest them but will have an uplifting influence mentally, morally and physically. I believe that such a paper can be made that will appeal to the masses in their own language, and yet so human and real as to teem with the breath of life.

"Sensationalism will be used where it serves a good purpose but we will not confine our idea of news to murder, suicides, and divorce scandal."

It is understod that Emile Gauvreau, managing editor of the Hartford Courant has been appointed managing editor of the new daily and John C. Cook, former business manager of the old New York Globe, business manager.

Monday was wash day once. Now it is the day we get the list of killed and injured in Sunday accidents.

HUNCHES

One Dollar Will Be Paid for Each "Hunch" published.

HOW many stars are there in the American flag? Ask a banker, a lawyer, a school teacher, a public school pupil and other people. Incorporate the answers in a story—without mentioning any names—and then urge folks to know more about their flag. An interesting story could be easily framed along this line.—Frank H. Williams, Santa Ana, Cal.

A feature story with a new angle for your automobile page: Find out what makes of cars the various officials of your city buy for their personal use and why. Short chatty bits, with some summary figures, are sure to go well.—James M. Mosely, Boston.

Keep the police department friendly with your paper. Give credit where it is due by telling some of the brave things the officers do as a matter of duty. There are perhaps several, often many, patrolmen who actually "flirt with death" in performing their tasks. Stories about such officers will make interesting reading as well as create considerable good will at the police stations.—A. C. Regli, Eau Claire, Wis.

Daily features on birthdays of prominent men, under stock head, with a tabloid history under cut is proving popular on St. Louis daily. Is goodwill feature and helps build up morgue.—I. K. Fagan, St. Louis Times.

There is a wealth of good feature material in the information girls of your telephone companies. In one Iowa town a man asks for Smith's telephone number living at Sixth street and there are eight of 'em on the same street. Really good stuff.—G. Smedal, Sioux City, Iowa.

A real drag for country weekly newspapers in towns of any size large enough to support a few industrial plants or large business houses can be had by getting out a very personal annual vacation number such as contained in the Two Rivers (Wis.) Chronicle of July 9. This enterprising newspaper went to every business house and factory in the city and obtained the names of all who were going or had gone on summer vacation trips and published them together. It took about two pages which were illustrated with cuts of the business streets and factories concerned. No doubt, this feature will prove more valuable to the Chronicle than so much advertising.—S. J. Harris, Sturgeon Bay, Wis.

Here's a feature that will prove to be popular! Under the heading "What Folks Say" give 5 quotations from different people in town every day, Let them talk about anything they wish and keep them down to 50 or 60 words. A cut of one of the people now and then will add interest to this feature. A few minutes a day will give you a much talked about feature.—R. John Gibler, St. Louis.

Every one follows to some extent the proceedings of the national Republican and Democratic conventions. How many persons in your district, however, actually understand the procedure followed in the election of a president? A reporter sent out to interview the average man or woman on the street would be almost sure to bring back some amazing answers. This assignment should make a stimulating educational feature.—William G. Colgate, Montreal.

WHAT OUR READERS SAY

Mr. Vandenberg's Amendment

To Editor & Publisher: I am gratified that Editor & Publisher should have emphasized my suggested amendment to the Canons of Journalism to the extent of condemning it in a lead editorial of generous length, which is to say that I do not in the slightest resent your strictures inasmuch as they will be the means of directing more scrutiny to the proposal itself. But I am sure you will allow me to say that your critic has wholly failed to sense either the necessity or the purport of my suggestion. Possibly a better understanding of it might induce a better warranted conclusion. I hesitate to intrude upon your good nature by way of rebuttal. But perhaps you will concede that you yourself raise a serious question when you deny the importance of constitutional acknowledgments, along with the other acknowledgments which journalism is supposed to accept under its Canons. On that point, if you desire, I should be glad to be heard further.

This is the amendment I have informally suggested for the Code of Ethics—an amendment inserted in the preamble describing general journalistic obligations:

"To its privileges under the freedom of American Institutions are inseparably joined its responsibilities for an intelligent fidelity to the Constitution of the United States."

(1) You say you do not believe that I intend this to chain journalism to an "unalterable" Constitution; yet you proceed to demolish my suggestion on the theory that I intend otherwise. Is that candid The major plaint you voice is that "nothing could be more dangerous than a pledge to remain fixed to a fallible exisitng order." Yet you admit, in advance, that no such intent lies in my purpose, and I submit that no such rigid reactionaryism can be logically ascribed to my proposal.

The Constitution contains within itself the machinery for its own "alteration." A pledge of fidelity to the Constitution embraces everything, including this machinery for amendment. Therefore my suggestion has no relation to an "unalterable" Constitution. But one of the big menaces of our time—foreseen in the original Federalist papers—is an inclination to change the Constitution without amending it. Do you wish to deny that the Constitution should be "unalterable" except as the "alterations" proceed pursuant to constitutional requirement? You certainly do not. Yet this specification is the sole possible pertinency of your criticism upon this particular score. So far as constitutional "alterations" are concerned, this proposed code amendment can mean but one thing: namely, fidelity to the method of "alteration" contained in the Constitution itself. You would not defend the negative of that proposition. Yet you attack the affirmative.

(2) You object to the phrase "intelligent fidelity"—with particular challenge to the adjective. May I say that you are very hard to please? Your initial complaint fears that fidelity may be "blind"; your immediately subsequent complaint fears lest it be "intelligent." I submit that "fidelity" alone is not enough.

Journalism, presumably the great teacher, must know why it is faithful; it must know the historical roots of its faith; it must understand constitutional theories in order to instruct its constituency in them; it must be able to support its instruction with accurate argument; in a word, it must be "intelligent" in its "constitutional fidelities" or it cannot be convincing, and it cannot meet its fundamental duty to the Great Charter, which is the source of its own greatest freedoms. The sanctity of constitutional institutions rests primarily in the hands of the American press. It cannot repel, let us say, communistic invaders by mere bombast or by mere flag waving. In the language of the street, it must "know its stuff." It must be constitutionally "intelligent."

Queer "ethics" indeed would be those that rejected "intelligence" as not useful. You mention the Eighteenth Amendment. May I say, parenthetically, that there is no "intelligent fidelity" in defying (your word) the Eighteenth Amendment; neither is there any "intelligent fidelity" in denying the right of the majority to amend or repeal it if they have the votes under the Constitution.

(3) You ask, "Why must newspaper editors be singled out to pledge fidelity to the Constitution?" That's too easy. For the same reason that judges and legislators and all other public servants are "singled out." None of these latter carry one whit more responsibility for our constitutional destinies than do "newspaper editors." Are we, or are we not, "The Fourth Estate"? To deny it would be to deny palpable fact plus the prides we frequently boast. To affirm it is to embrace more than an opportunity and a privilege; it is also to embrace a desperately vital responsibility and obligation. Is it "absurd" (your word) to acknowledge the latter as well as the former? It is never "absurd" to be intelligently patriotic.

This whole contemplation, let me say in conclusion, is academic. By the same token, the entire Canons of Journalism are academic. Yet they are vitally useful in establishing the high goals of professional dedication. My only proposition is that since we have undertaken, at last, to describe and locate these goals, we should not ignore the most vital of all journalistic responsibilities—namely, to the roots of all American stability and progress and prosperity. The canons dedicate us to "truth." In the spirit of your editorial, one might say that it is "absurd" to announce "truth" as an aspiration—because no one would dare acknowledge any other aim. Yet "truth" has its place—its proper place—in the new code. By the same token the Constitution of the United States, totally ignored in this code, deserves specific acknowledgment. I respectfully dissent from your observations to the contrary.

Cordially and faithfully yours,
A. H. Vandenberg,
Grand Rapids Herald.

Values Big Number

To Editor & Publisher:

Editor & Publisher will be so smothered with appreciations of its "On to Britain" number of June 21 that I should take pity on it and forebear; but for the life of me I cannot help adding a stone to the cairn of richly merited recognition. I believe the number in question to be the best special edition of a trade paper ever published. It gives in compact shape a wealth of information about London, the British Isles and our own Texas and the Southwest that should make it a book of reference for those outside the newspaper profession.

But in a larger sense the publication is of much more vital import. It makes for the real endless universal peace that most of us pray for. The Briton is no longer the Yankee's "cousin," but his brother. Let us solemnly swear that nothing shall estrange them again to the end of time!

The "On to Britain" book is doubly welcome to the library of our society in that it contains bits of authentic history in form so concise as to save readers the trouble of ransacking weighty tomes of world record. It will be indexed carefully, well bound and preserved as long as our new building on Capitol Hill, St. Paul, endures.

••• A. B. C. Statement, April 1, 1924.
††† Government Statement, April 1, 1924.

Many manufacturers, especially those who have been in business long enough to remember conditions as they were before the World War, think of the South as it existed then.

Before the World War the labor question was not so much of a question as it is now.

Before the World War the natural products of the South were not as valuable as they are now.

The increase in prices—the tremendous demands have served as incentives for Southern planters to adopt intensive and diversified farming—and has called for many more field hands.

The demand for steel products has intensified the demand for labor in that industry.

The new mills and factories which now dot the entire South have called for hundreds of thousands of operatives.

The present trend of development in the South is toward industrial and trade enterprises. The South has caught step with the manufacturing centers of the country and is no longer content to send its raw materials North and East to be converted into finished goods. They are being worked up at home in increasing volume, with resultant stimulation to all branches of trade.

The South wants merchandise. The South wants labor-saving machinery, tractors, trucks —everything that will help speed up production and increase the earning power of the section.

These people—particularly Southern women who are doing their own work—demand the most modern, labor-saving devices. They want prepared or semi-prepared food. They want kitchen conveniences. They want washing machines, bread mixers, sewing machines, and hundreds of things they never thought of previously.

Go to these people through their local dealers and local newspapers. In these listed newspapers you will find a tried and tested class of mediums for covering the vast Southern market.

A REMARKABLE PROPHECY

THE CONSOLIDATED PRESS calls attention to a remarkable prophecy made by David Lawrence with reference to the Democratic nomination of John W. Davis, a prophecy which ranks with the accurate prediction made of the outcome of the 1916 election.

Again it was not a mere guess but a story based upon logic and matured analysis of American politics. It was also a piece of skillful reporting, for the discovery of the sources of John W. Davis' strength among the delegates enabled David Lawrence to state positively many days in advance of the action of the convention that the West Virginian would be the ultimate selection.

Just a year ago—July 10, 1923—when President Harding was still alive and the discussion of Democratic candidates was beginning, David Lawrence wrote the following:

> "John W. Davis of West Virginia is one of the most brilliant men ever suggested for the presidency of the United States. In intellectual attainment, oratorical ability, legal achievement, and international background he has few equals in America today * * * * * Mr. Davis' chances of nomination lie particularly in 1924, as they did in 1920, in the possibility of a deadlock. He is the type of candidate to whom the party beset by extremes might turn as a compromise."
> Before convention began balloting, David Lawrence wrote on June 28 the following:
> "The McAdoo men will never go to Smith. The Smith men will never go to McAdoo * * * * * Just now John W. Davis has more second choice strength than any man in the convention. And that's why—assuming that neither McAdoo nor Smith can be nominated—he can be looked upon to emerge as the beneficiary of both."
> July 1—"The chances of a victory for Davis appear brightest at the moment as he has a strong following in both the McAdoo and Smith camps. * * * * * Here and there are scattered votes for Davis but his biggest opportunity lies in the fact that he is second choice of scores of delegates and is looked upon as a logical compromise."
> July 9—When McAdoo released his delegates, David Lawrence promptly wrote that the nomination of John W. Davis was assured.

Let David Lawrence cover the national campaign for you. Arrangements are being made now for exclusive rights in a limited number of cities. Make your reservation now.

What Your Chicago Buyers Read

If you sell any sort of legitimate merchandise in Chicago and its nearby suburbs, the majority of your customers are regular readers of The Chicago Daily News, because—

The 400,000 circulation of the Daily News, concentrated 94 per cent in Chicago and its suburbs, is largely a homeward bound circulation, and that means, at a conservative estimate, that The Daily News has 1,200,000 daily readers.

In the great majority of financially competent households of Chicago, where English is read, The Daily News is an established habit—a part of the family life.

It is read with zest and trusted with full confidence by the young and the progressive as well as the older and more conservative citizens, because it renders the most efficient newspaper service to its readers that they can buy. It gives all today's important news today—12 hours earlier than the same news appears in any morning paper, and more comprehensively and dependably than in other evening papers.

And its readers read it not only for its news and editorial features, but for advertising information and guidance. It is the advertising directory and guide of one of the largest, most compact and most diversified markets in the world.

Consequently in its field it leads all its competitors in volume of advertising carried. In the first six months of 1924 it carried 7,945,765 agate lines of display advertising, as against 5,989,555 carried by the Chicago daily newspaper having the next highest score—a morning newspaper.

Thus, reader interest and reader confidence react in advertising effectiveness and advertising leadership as "cause and effect." These elements of journalistic efficiency combine to make in Northern Ohio the Plain Dealer has the BUYERS!

THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS

FIRST IN CHICAGO

THE audience that it really pays to cultivate is made up of people who are able to buy what you have to sell, when you have to sell it.

Northern Ohio's 3,000,000 people have the money—no question about it. Payrolls totalling well over $800,000,000 annually go into the pockets of the workers who help make this great prosperous territory the second in the country in diversified industries.

Figures prove that The Plain Dealer has the BUYERS.

And results back up the figures.

Advertisers know that The Plain Dealer alone reaches and sells the buyers of Northern Ohio. They know it puts the stories of their wares into the front doors of the buying homes—into the hands of the men and women who are readily responsive to their advertising.

That's why The Plain Dealer regularly carries MORE National advertising than ALL other Cleveland newspapers combined. Likewise, why The Plain Dealer GAINED nearly three times as much National advertising as ALL other Cleveland newspapers during the first 6 months of 1924.

It is not enough merely to reach a large audience. Profitable advertising must sell your market. The Plain Dealer ALONE will sell it.

Surveys prove these FACTS

—In districts where the rent averages $40 to $50, The Plain Dealer reaches 41% of all homes

—In districts where the rent averages $50 to $75 The Plain Dealer reaches 77% of all homes

—In districts where the rent averages $75 and up, The Plain Dealer reaches 88% of all homes

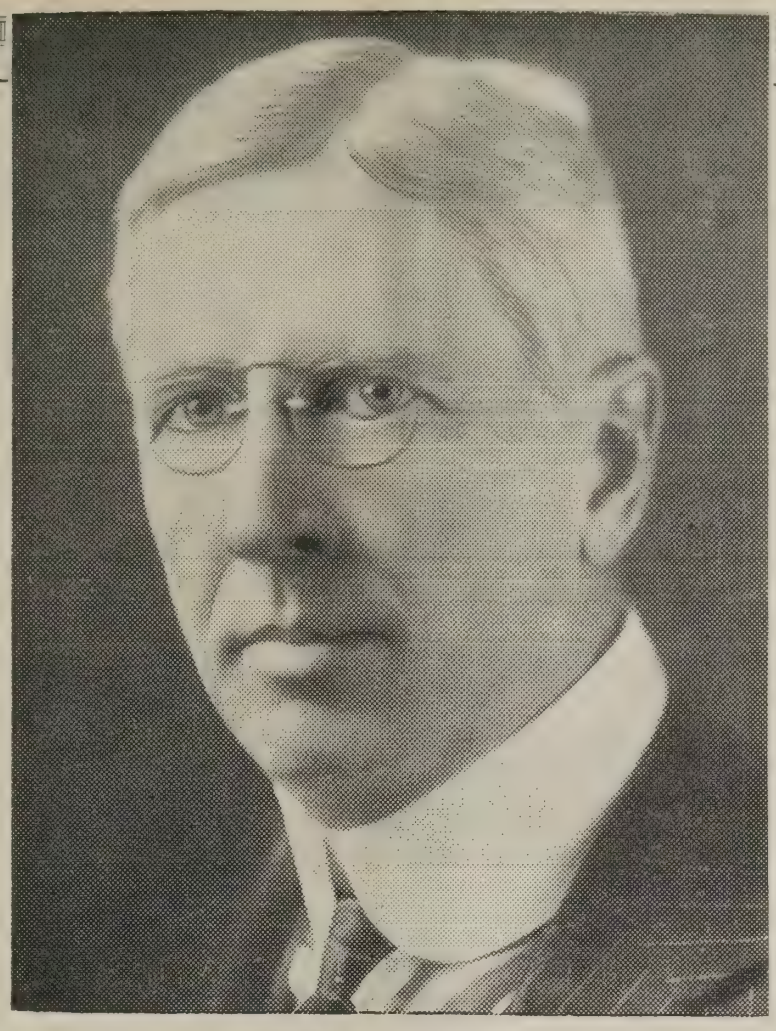
"I believe that Mark Sullivan is the best commentator upon national political affairs in the United States—a position which he has gained logically enough by joining to his knowledge and ability an unusual degree of fairness and fearlessness."



WALTER H. PAGE,
Editor, World's Work.

"Sullivan is a true news writer of the first order."

MEDILL McCORMICK,
U. S. Senator, Illinois.

"Mr. Sullivan's fine common sense and courage enable him to ascertain facts and give conclusions which may be implicitly relied on."

CARTER GLASS,
U. S. Senator, Virginia.

MARK SULLIVAN

"Mr. Sullivan's connection is of the highest value to the Oregonian. His letters are always informative. But above everything, they bear an impress of sincerity, impartiality, intelligence, and good judgment."

EDGAR E. PIPER,
Editor, Portland Oregonian.

"I have for several years looked upon Mark Sullivan as the most dependable all-around newspaper writer in Washington."

HARVEY INGHAM,
Editor, Des Moines Register.

"His articles during the Presidential campaign of 1920 reveal an almost uncanny prevision of the election results."

R. J. CUDDIHY,
Literary Digest.

Harold B. Johnson, Editor, Says of Mark Sullivan's Service

"Now that the convention is over, I want to write you to tell you what a good service Mark Sullivan has given us. It has been remarkable from every standpoint. The pre-convention stuff was good, extending back many months. I have been over some of his articles recently and am amazed at the extent of his information and the exactness with which some of his early conclusions have now been carried out.

"Best of all we like the thoroughness with which he has done the job. His dispatches have given us a remarkable lead in reporting the convention and we appreciate it thoroughly.

"If you have an occasion to see Mr. Sullivan will you please express to him personally our sincere thanks for the way he has taken care of us. Tell him that we have a lot of readers up here who do not believe that anything has happened until they read his comment as to how and why it took place."

Mr. Sullivan's letters will be essential to every newspaper desiring a thoughtful, clear, vigorous, independent view of the coming political campaign.

What the man from Seattle says about

Philadelphia

Bernard Drummond, a retired real estate broker of Seattle, Washington, paid Philadelphia a visit on his vacation and said:

"Every city envies Philadelphia's reputation as a city of homes. When it becomes cheaper to buy or build than pay rent, a city grows, shakes off its transient population problem and gains a lot of good citizens. A rent payer is a nomad. Patriotism flourishes among people who own their own homes.

Most of the half a million homes in Philadelphia and vicinity are owned by their occupants. This means that these families are gilt-edge prospects for national advertisers and also explains why so many are getting such profitable results from the paper that goes daily into nearly every Philadelphia home.

Classic Posthumous Analysis of Reporting By Able Reporter Macfarlane

Copyright 1924 by Editor & Publisher

PETER CLARK MACFARLANE, whose suicide at San Francisco brought sorrow to many, was a great reporter. Born in Missouri, he traveled much and always with wide-open eyes. A student, he knew books and hearts of men, cities and camps and war's immortal woe. A preacher, actor, author, journalist, the friendliest of men, he was first and always a reporter. He was a reporter with keenness of observation, clearness of statement, vividness of picturing, and of big heart.

At the International Press Congress in San Francisco in 1915 he was asked to speak. He chose for his subject "The Work of the Reporter." The notes of his speech, hitherto unpublished, are in the library of the School of Journalism of the University of Missouri. "Use them, if you will," said MacFarlane, "they may help some young reporters to realize the tremendous responsibility of their great calling."

"Reporting is not a career," said Mr. MacFarlane, "it is a cycle in a man's life. Your reporter begins young—eyes as big as saucers, ears as big as sails, hope as big as heaven. Everything is a story and every story is big. Enthusiasm is large, and vision larger, ignorance largest of all. Those are a cub's characteristics. At one end of the city room, excitable, imaginative youth; strike a match and he believes a bomb has been exploded! At the other end, experience, old at thirty-five, so blase that you might explode a bomb under his chair, and he would finish the sentence he was writing, bend over and knock the ashes out on the edge of the cuspidor (can't you see him?) and look around and say, 'Who struck that match?' But the odd thing is that the man who is necessary to the paper is not the man who knows so much, but the man who can feel so much. Every year a new flock of cubs come into the desks, and the city editor frowns and looks suspicious, and the copyholders growl, and yet we have to have these boys to make the paper. There is something in the sparkle and tang of life that has to go into the pages of the paper, something that comes from nowhere but the heart of youth. The cub is big and clumsy, inexpert of life, the world seems to him as it does to a baby, a great big buzzing doll. But they are the boys that put the news in. And it is an odd thing that as a man ceases to be young and foolish he is in danger of ceasing to be a good reporter. It is odd but it is a fact. As the flock of cubs come in, the stream of the old boys goes straggling out. People sometimes feel sympathetic about these victims of remorseless time, but you can spare your tears. With the exception of those who wear hats in the house almost all of us here have a sprinkling of gray hairs, and I observe some old reporters. Our legs are not so tireless as they used to be, we are not always first on the scene, we do not grind out as much copy as we used to, but I think we do it better. There is not as much enthusiasm, but, I suspect, more sense. We have learned how to take care of ourselves, and we slip on to be editors, or business men, or fiction writers, or become secretaries of the navy, or secretaries of state, and you do not need to pity us so very much. And there are a few of us that—well, that come into the Home for Superannuated Newspaper Men in time; but even then, we have played our part in the greatest game there is; we have seen a few big things in our day, have written a few big stories: once, far out on the line, a managing editor sent us a telegram with the words 'Thank you,' and we kept that and showed it until it was worn out; but the memory has not worn out at all.

The Late Peter Clark Macfarlane

MACFARLANE EPIGRAMS

The reporting man must be a writing man.

The reporter who takes nothing to the fact will bring nothing away.

You will probably write best if you write like yourself.

The time for dull grey writing is past, like the time for dull grey living.

News is power.

"Something has gone out of us, it was not wrung out of us, we gave it out into the story, into the paper, into the thought or the word. It is a great thing to be a news gatherer, and everything that is published, hourly, daily, weekly, monthly, annually, depends for its value on the news in it. If a book of fiction is not news, it is not a best seller; if an advertisement is not news, it is not a successful advertisement. The 'Man with the Hoe' was a poem, too, but it was news, and it went all over the country. When the Bible ceases to be a book of news, it will cease to circulate. Let me write your news, and I do not care who writes the editorial. The typewriter of the correspondent is bigger than the cannon. The biggest jar in this war did not come from the shell or the submarine; it came from a few lines telegraphed from a battle front by a reporter who said that after eight months of preparation the soldiers of Great Britain were halted because they had not the right kind of ammunition. The greatest piece of reporting done in America in these recent months was just the publication by the papers of a personal letter written by Mr. Woodrow Wilson on the other side; the power in that was not in any armament that backed it, it was not in any beautiful style that expressed it, it was in the news the letter contained. News is power. Let the eyes of the press burn brilliantly, and society will take care of itself. Put out the eyes of the press, and the world and society will grope in blindness. News, however, cannot exist without the reporter. There is an impression that possibly the reporter is becoming extinct like the dodo. It is said that we have two new sets of men. They are called the leggers and the rewrite men. The leggers are the young men with big eyes and big ears and long noses, butting into everyone's affairs and rushing to the telephone. At the other end of the telephone sits the rewrite man with the high-priced imagination. He undertakes to translate the inaccuracies of the leggers into news, to spread before his readers an accurate impression of things he has not seen, of sounds he has not heard. There is an impression that to make an up-to-date paper, these are the means that you must use to get to the ears of the people, but if a paper does this very long the result is that, as it screams louder and louder, it by-and-by loses its voice entirely. But without preaching, I want to say that the newspaper which depends upon somebody's imagination for this kind of work is going to be less interesting, and day in and day out that paper which depends upon the writer, upon the vividness and power of his imagination, rather than upon the vividness and power of the news stories, upon the individual reporter who goes out and exposes himself to the infection of the fact will not stay interesting.

"Then we come to the reporter himself. The reporter must go out and see and find and hear and know; and then he must write so you will go where he has gone, and find what he has found, and see what he has seen, and hear what he has heard, and know what he has known. To be a reporter is not to be a human camera or a phonograph. The reporter is not a machine, he is an intelligence. He does not allow the fact to lie on his mind as upon a blank page, he allows it to act upon his intelligence. The reporter who takes nothing to the fact will bring nothing away, not even the fact itself, when he comes back to the office. The measure of the reporter is almost always the measure of the man He has limitations. Talk to the man of the ordinary city paper and you will find he feels his limitations to be enormous. But it is for him to remove the limitations. He has to force his way through every channel and write into his pages what no blue pencilling can put out. He may give you an impression that his paper is a great machine that grinds him up into sausage meat, but it is his meat, is it not? And he can have the satisfaction of knowing that has forced himself through.

"But not only must the reporter see, he must write. The reporting man must be a writing man. That does not necessarily mean flowers and phrases and fine words, though it may. You may write like Marie Corelli, or Mister Roosevelt, if you can, or like Woodrow Wilson, if you can; but you will probably do your best if you write like yourself. There are no rules for writers that are not modified by the personality of the individual. The point is to get originality, to set down facts that glow and quiver and have the light of life in them. Some get that light one way, some another way; but you must get it if the combination of words which you use are to give the reader the same view that you as a writer have. The time for dull gray writing is past, like the time for dull gray living. You cannot write a successful magazine story today in the sober and mature stride inculcated twenty years ago, and have enough people read it to make it pay. The successful article must depend not only upon the interest of the subject matter but the manner in which the matter is presented. That is not a sign of deterioration in public taste. It is an advance. It marks the abandonment of a pose, the demand that vital interest shall appear in vital form. It asks the reporter that he be human, that he yield somewhat to the play of the fact upon himself. The result will not be less true, but more so. The psychologist has told us that we have done about nine-tenths of our thinking below the neck; the reporter had better do a good deal of his writing below the neck, or it won't be a human document. The time for the stilted construction, for the long involved sentence, is past. People have not the time to explore your sentences. They are apt to think if you don't express the thought clearly you have not got it clearly, that if the paragraph does not glow, the fire must have gone out; that if your sentences do not squirm, and wriggle, and leap out from the page, they must be dead.

"We allege that our papers demand sensation. There is sensation everywhere—in the papers, in the theater, in the pulpit. I am not sure that it is anything to be complained of. This is a noisy age. If you want to make yourself heard, you have got to lift your voice. But the disposition to judge a thing by the amount of sensation it creates is a pretty fair instinct. If there is not much pulse, there is not much life. Jesus was pretty sensational that day when He picked up a cat-o'-nine-tails and whipped a lot of the highbinders out of the temple. But that sensationalism was an expression of His personality, of the intensity of His moral nature. The thing to complain against is not the demand for sensation, but the habit of furnishing a false sensation when there is no real one, or when the wit of the reporter was not keen enough to get the real one. In every piece of news that happens, in every event, there is a certain sensation that may be real, but may be altogether false, and it is easier sometimes to write the false sensation than the true one. It is easier to write fiction than fact—I pretend to know because I pretend to do both. It is the reporter with the surface mind who sees the surface fact, and writes the surface story; and it is a thing that will be accepted by some surface minds that read it, to its hurt. That thought confers a pretty high respondsibility. When the whole population of San Francisco turns over a clean page of its mind this afternoon to be smudged by a lot of men and women who tell the happenings of the day, that means a pretty high responsibility. It leaves a big responsibility on the press, a responsibility that is all through journalism, and on the reporter.

"The editor of a few years ago said the people only wanted facts. 'Never mind about the writing,' he said, 'put it down, put it down!' They advocated an enormous mass of facts. But have you noticed in the last few years, especially in the afternoon papers which are read by people who have a little more time, columns of comment, of personal advice to the lovesick, and so on and on? Do you know what that all means? It means that people are tired of a diet of hamburger steak, and now they want something garnished, something made digestible by the vital juices of some personality. The day of the writing man has come, and he is important to the community. This is a supreme moment, it seems to me, for the man who holds the pen poised in his hand. Big events have always made big writers. In every newspaper office there is a tradition that some one man; some plodder who once was swept clear out of himself on the tide of some big story, a man hitherto without imagination whose imagination suddenly awoke and took fire. He had been a man dull of words, now his phrases seem to blaze. He had had the ability just to generalize, and then something happened that made him seem to hold the universe on his pen.

"This is a great day. The world, society, is going to be recreated in our generation. There is new spirit of social development abroad in this world of ours that has made men enlarge their ideas. A few years ago achievement seemed the great object. I suppose, if you will permit a personal reference, I have seen into the hearts, in the last three years, of the men doing the big things in America, and the things I bring back from the heart of every great man is this new sense of social service, of the knowledge that their work is bigger than bread and butter. Journalism is greater than bread and butter. It does not exist for our bread and butter, but to supply the want of the world; and as we supply that want, our work will be good or ill.

"I was talking one night a few years ago with one of the greatest newspaper men in the world. The hour was late, the last edition was put to sleep; far off the rumbling of the press was dimly heard. No telephone rang, no copy boys came, and the man was just showing me his heart. He was telling me the story that has never been published, the story of his beginning in the slums of a great city where, the day that Garfield was shot, Gladstone walked down the street and bought his paper. At the time he was managing editor of what boasted itself as the greatest newsaper in the world. He began to tell me then what things he hoped to do. He was still an employe. He was not rich. He did not even own the paper that he had helped to make great; but the plan he had evolved and that he was telling me about was just a little scheme for the good of the race. I do not even know if it was practical. But that was the thing that this man, whom the world almost feared because he dared to wield the scepter of his power without fear, had before him as his dream. His dream was just a dream of helping things on. Then, as if he thought perhaps I should be surprised, he suddenly said: 'Do you know that the big newspaper of tomorrow is not going to be built of scoops or beats, but of service? The paper that renders the largest service to its subscribers is going to be the greatest paper.' That was not said to me as the sentiment of a soft-hearted man, but as the deliberate judgment of a hard-headed man.

"I sat one morning with Henry Ford listening to him talk reminiscences. Then he began to talk about his little cars. He was not talking about his output, not about the millions. He was rejoicing in the comfort and the happiness that his cars were bringing to the little people. He did not boast of the product of his factory, but of the producers. He told me what good citizens they were. Now that man is a type. He did not make the new social sympathy, the new social sympathy made him. And writing men were the men who spread this social sympathy. Their writing was the ether on which this social sympathy traveled in heat waves from the heart of the country. Your reporter is a great asset. When you stop and count up the compensation in pelf, it is not very large, but if a reporter can feel himself somehow akin to Homer and Moses, there is reward; if a reporter can see himself sometimes the engine of divine wrath, sometimes the ministering angel, sometimes the light that leads men kindly, there is compensation enough.

"To be a reporter is a great calling."

EMPLOYES' PENS BLUNT NATION'S EDITORIALS

And Underpaid Writers Cannot Keep Essential Contacts With the World, In Opinion of Alfred Holman, San Francisco Bulletin's New Editor

By TRUMAN HANDY

"THE writer who cringes, or hedges, neither gets his readers' respect nor keeps his own.

"There must be no mincing diplomacy in editorial expression; no tilting at windmills,—nothing but frankness in the declaration of one's opinions supported by adequate reason.

"Where I can see no solution of even a public evil I leave it alone. I do not believe in threshing the air with an impossible idea."

These views of Alfred Holman, editor of the San Francisco Bulletin and former publisher of the Argonaut, whose pen in recent years has marked him as one of the most trenchant and widely-read editorialists in the country, attach a broad significance to current newspaper ethics.

And Mr. Holman, as a newspaper owner-publisher and as a member of both the advisory board of the Pulitzer School of Journalism and the board of trustees of the Carnegie Endowment for Peace, of which Elihu Root is chairman, occupies not only a rare position today in American journalism but is, like Fremont Older and the later Harrison Grey Otis, an outstanding figure as a pioneer in Western newspaper dictatorship.

He is distinctly a thinker and of rather unusual status. Inasmuch as the majority of his life has been devoted to writing almost exclusively for his own papers, his work quite naturally has been characterized by a frankness, a freedom, that rarely can be the product of an employed pen.

At the same time he is no radical. One finds him thoroughly tolerant, deeply interested in the young newspaper man of today, in the maker of future newspaper history. He is quiet, calm, cosmopolitan. Scholastic in aspect. A man of broad conceptions.

When the Bulletin, San Francisco's oldest daily, changed ownership recently, there was a dubious flurry in Pacific newspaper circles.

Who would the new editor be?

Would the Bulletin, avowedly a paper of extreme popular flavor, continue its stand for the people with its new comptrollers comprising a group of particularly eminent local capitalists?

How could such a merger of extremes possibly be accomplished?

At length Holman was announced the new editor—the same Holman who for nearly two decades has been personally responsible for the discerning and basically reliable Argonaut that has the distinction of being the first journal of opinion published in the West to run in harness tandem with the Dial, the Nation and others of similar category.

And, incidentally, it was the Argonaut which, under Holman's guidance, first scraped sundry politics out of a rather bilgy mire and, in addition, brought to light Ambrose Bierce, whom each fleeting years sees more acclaimed the equal, if not perhaps the peer, of Poe.

Holman was busy making certain rearrangements of the Bulletin when interviewed for EDITOR & PUBLISHER. In fact, his guiding force there is already vastly apparent.

"Writing," he said, "must be an honest expression. No man writes convincingly of views which are not his own conviction and thinking. Editorial writing, to be effective, must deal in the main with matter that is current, with the best of it explaining the meaning of things not obvious to the reader. It should interpret the news.

"The man who brings to current events the support of illustrations and principles drawn from history and lessons of life as he has seen them makes a vital contribution to public intelligence.

"As I appraise the editorial writing of the country its main fault, I find is that it is too largely the work of employed pens.

"Also, editorial writers have too little opportunity for contacts that keep them in touch with the active forces of their time and without which no man can be intimately conscious of the facts of an atmosphere that should inspire him.

"The man who lives in a Harlem flat and who touches life only through the office of his newspaper can have only poor equipment for his work.

"The fault is largely with the publishers. Not one in 20 pays those who write his paper with a liberality that enables them to mingle on free, equal terms with the world on the one hand of which they write and the other of which he addresses.

"Only a few months ago Mr. Munsey told me there was not an editorial writer in New York who had the opportunities for contacts that his job required. It is a case now of either permitting men freedom or of paying them enough so that they can properly support relationships for their works."

Nor, as has been said, does Holman speak from the standpoint of an outraged hireling. His interest in the paper he now edits is partly proprietary and, with the exception of various contributions to the North American Review, Century and other magazines and, in recent years, to the New York Times, he has been, since 1888, publisher and editor of the Seattle Post-Intelligencer and owner-editor of the Pacific Rural Press, of San Francisco, the San Jose Mercury and the Sacramento Union, as well as the Argonaut.

Despite his proprietary interests he rebels against commercialized journalism. For instance:

"In my several publications the centre of gravity has always been in its head rather than in the stomach, with the policy made in the editorial room rather than in the business office. I hope I do not boast when I admit of a series of modest successes under this regime. It can be done!

"An editor has no more right to juggle with opinions and judgments than a judge on the bench. Opinion is not a commodity than can be bought and sold successfully. Nor is the influence which, in one degree or another every editor may exercise, something he may lend or give away.

"While one may accord or withold publicity at his pleasure he may not, if he be an honest man, apply the same principle to his opinions. I would as soon feed poison to my readers as to give them biased information or twisted judgment."

For the young journalist Holman has the highest ideals and a strict doctrine, prescribing what Polonius epitomized: "To thine own self be true." It was brought out forcefully to him early in his career, he says, by the late Harvey W. Scott, for half a century publisher of the Portland Oregonian, and who gave Holman his real introduction to journalism as his personal assistant.

Scott's theory was, "Give your readers strong meat," and, throughout the years, Holman has purposely followed it.

"Looking back over a fairly long career," he said, "I regard journalism as one of the most inviting professional careers, extending opportunities to a young man afforded by none other—opportunities of distinction and service that are hardly paralleled.

"In any legitimate view it calls for no moral compromise and any other than legitimate journalism should be avoided like any other evil thing.

"The small newspaper remains the best training school for unseasoned writers for, while the great papers hold men to a narrow classification of work, in the smaller ones all columns are open to initiative and industry.

"I would counsel the young man: (1) Take your character with you always; (2) make no compromises; (3) always do your best work; (4) extend your contacts with men and things, and (5) read unceasingly what is going on in the world and read the best books.

"Your work should be done in the professional spirit. If this can't be accomplished in one association go somewhere where it can be done. No other road leads to the kind of success that is worth having; it is the only way to build character and to maintain self-respect in journalism or any other career."

ALFRED HOLMAN'S FIVE POINTS

Take your character with you always.

(2)

Make no compromises.

(3)

Always do your best work.

(4)

Extend your contacts with men and things.

(5)

Read unceasingly what is going on in the world and read the best books.

CAPPER HOST TO 17,000 CHILDREN

Seventeen thousand young and grown-up children of Topeka, Kan., were guests of Senator Arthur Capper at the picnic with which he celebrated his 59th birthday, July 14. For the past 16 years Senator Capper, publisher of the Daily Capital, has marked his anniversaries by giving the city's children an outing, and last week's turnout made a new record, according to George C. Cobbe, city circulation manager of the Capital, in charge of arrangements.

ASKS $150,000 FOR LIBEL

Ex-Employe of Vanderbilt Paper Sues Ladies' Home Journal

Captain Edward J. Ralph, formerly of the army and Aid to the Assistant Secretary of War, recently filed suit in Los Angeles against the Curtis Publishing Company of Philadelphia, asking $150,000 damages for alleged libel, as the result of an article published in the Ladies' Home Journal for May, 1924.

The article referred to purported to be an interview with Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr., whose corporation publishes the Los Angeles Daily News, and of which Captain Ralph was one of the original directors.

The article detailed Mr. Vanderbilt's efforts to start his paper in the face of a "widespread conspiracy and the efforts of treacherous executives within the organization." The article stated that "three of the executives were discharged summarily on ample proof of their treachery."

Captain Ralph, with two others, was asked to resign from the corporation, but, he declares, not for the reasons given in the Ladies' Home Journal article, which he asserts is untrue.

NEW AND AUTHENTIC HISTORY OF THE HERALD OF THE BENNETTS

By ALBERT EVANDER COLEMAN—41 Years on the New York Herald staff

All the way through the pages of this little book portions of Herald news stories are torn and twisted to suit the libellous purposes of the author, though he must have been perfectly well aware that a "live" newspaper like the Herald covered all the news, however sensational or repulsive might be the cases of immorality and criminality that had to be written up. The author made use of every form of abuse; attacked his private character, and even dragged in the names of his wife and infant son to increase the force of the blows struck at him anonymously.

"James Gordon Bennett is six feet high, when he stands straight; lean, raw boned; lanthorn jawed; with a very long, crooked nose; a disagreeable mouth; small grey eyes, squinting so terribly, that their apparent angle of vision does not extend more than half an inch from the narrow bridge of the nose. He has a narrow forehead; grizzly hair and whiskers, and speaks with a broad Scotch accent. He is exceedingly violent and profane in his language to those in his empoly, treating them habitually with the most vulgar abuse."

The concluding sentence of this waspish little volume is a barefaced denial of the facts regarding the Herald's steady growth and increasing prosperity. Here follows the venomous paragraph:

"The whole establishment exhibits decrepitude and decay. Bennett, as malicious as ever, has not even the miserable power to do mischief. With failing energies and a tottering establishment, he is the serpent without his fang—the viper without his venom—hissing but stingless."

Mr. Bennett entirely ignored this last impotent attack and the book practically fell dead from the press.

Both Beach and Bennett plainly intimated that each other's competing newspaper was "going down" rapidly, and Mr. Bennett expressed this view one day in the following squib:

"The Sun is now rapidly going down, in consequence of its inertness, want of talent, want of principle, and want of enterprise. The Herald is going up and we mean to maintain our admitted supremacy."

In 1844 Mr. Bennett made a notable addition to his news gathering facilities by establishing a daily express between New Orleans and New York, enabling him to secure news in from one to four days in advance of the mails. He systematically covered the entire Southern field, including even Havana and the then disturbed territory of Texas.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

Mr. Bennett As a Censor of Newspaper Morals—Prosecutes Noah for Libel—Is Publicly Whipped—Herald's Use of the Telegraph

MR. BENNETT kept a close watch over the struggles of his contemporaries for existence, and for any derelictions from the "straight and narrow path," and early in 1845 caught the Tribune in the "fabrication of 'important' foreign news," pointing his editorial finger at poor Greeley, who was too mortified to reply. It was well understood that the Tribune was far from prosperous, and was constantly being beaten by the Herald in the collection of news.

Another editor and publisher to be given some unwelcome publicity about this time was "Cheap Jimmy," the fate of whose little daily is thus described:

"ANOTHER NEWSPAPER GONE.—The American Advocate, recently started by a person calling himself 'Cheap Jimmy'—and cheap enough, we suppose he now feels himself to be—disappeared one morning, bright and early last week, and has been added to the number swallowed up by the Aurora and the notorious Plebeian. Such is the end of another of those fruitless and bootless attempts, by persons unacquainted with the business, to start newspapers. 'Cheap Jimmy' announces he has lost $2,000. If that be all, he has reason to congratulate himself as having made a very good bargain. Some of the papers that have exploded recently have lost from $10,000 to $20,000 each, and others now in existence will probably lose as much before they learn sense and clear out of the way of those who know how to manage newspapers."

The Aurora was pretty bad, but the Plebeian was "much worse," according to Mr. Bennett, being "coarse, vulgar and obscene."

Again, in the fall of 1845, Mr. Bennett drew the attention of the public to another of Noah's freak schemes, in the following skit:

"VOICE FROM AN OLD CLOTHES SHOP.—We are very much gratified in perceiving by a notice in one of the small papers that M. M. Noah, formerly an editor in this city, of some celebrity, is still alive, and is endeavoring with laudable ambition to make a little noise in the world before closing his mortal career. Not having heard much of him of late, we supposed he had been buried amongst old clo', or had been slumbering amongst the dead. But it seems he is actually still alive and kicking. He intends, we understand, to get up a Convention—a 'Native Convention' of all native editors for the purpose of adopting resolutions to effect the exclusion of all foreign born editors, reporters and newspaper proprietors. According to the most recent accounts, it seems a large proportion of the independent press of this country is managed by persons born in other lands. 'Old Clo' thinks this highly dangerous! Hence his patriotic effort."

This attack spurred Noah on to repeat some of his slanders against Mrs. Bennett in his paper, the Sunday Times. His reckless and vindictive policy thoroughly roused Mr. Bennett, who on January 29, 1846, in a slashing editorial, announced his prosecution of Noah for libel, both civilly and criminally:

"PROSECUTIONS FOR LIBEL AGAINST M. M. NOAH.—We have given directions to our lawyer to begin fifteen or twenty separate and distinct suits for false and malignant libels, published by an old Jew, called Mordecai Manasseh Noah,* against my family during the last five or six months. These will be civil suits, but I shall at the proper time lay all those aggregate and atrocious offences before the Grand Jury.

"For more than six years, this man Noah has been defaming my reputation and character by the publication of the most atrocious falsehoods against myself, until by his conduct he has broken down and been driven from every newspaper with which he was connected. For these libels on myself, I care nothing—and never would have noticed them in any shape, but during the last six months he has had the audacity and brutality to try to defame and insult all the female members of my family. * For these mean and brutal attacks—conscious of being equal to any person in this community, either in birth, education or reputation, my family have too much spirit—too high a personal character—and too much contempt for the source they spring from, to give them a moment's uneasiness. But it is a duty which I owe to society—to the good name which will be transmitted to my children, during their future career, to take this brutal man, Noah, from the sink of corruption and beastliness into which he has fallen—to bring him into the courts of justice and to punish him and exhibit his beastly career as a warning to others.

"The cause of this atrocious conspiracy against me and my family may be readily traced to the remarkable success of the newspaper establishment which I have created in this country without money or rich friends. The surprising success has so far surpassed the expectations of my contemporaries that they attribute to my prosperity and untiring enterprise the downfall of their own schemes, and the destruction of their own miserable papers. Hence the jealousy—the rivalry—the hatred—the intense hostility which many journals entertain toward the Herald and its proprietor.

"I came to this city nearly thirty years ago. I started the Herald in 1835, and have succeeded by my own talents, industry and the generosity of the American people to place it at the head of journalism in this continent. This has excited the mean jealousy of my rivals, and in this brutal mode of warfare this Jew, M. M. Noah, has been from the beginning one of the principal instigators and ringleaders, but it is only during the last few months that I could catch the wretch on his own responsibility, or under his own name."

Bennett's contemporaries did not take his quarrel with Noah very seriously and made fun of both of them. Greeley in the Tribune thus referred to the subject:

"TIT FOR TAT.—Mr. Bennett, of the Herald, states that he has commenced fifteen or twenty libel suits against Major Noah for articles recently published in the Sunday Times—being, we presume, the 'Black Mail Lectures' which have made that paper almost as popular as the Mercury, under the refreshing 'stated preaching' of Dow, Jr. We learn further that the Major is fully up to snuff, and announces his intention of bringing thirty or forty prosecutions against Bennett. Every time the Major is served with a writ, slap! go two writs upon Bennett's shoulder. Bennett will lose at this game, unless he plays it very extensively."

Mr. Bennett Is Whipped

As luck would have it, the same day that Mr. Bennett's violent editorial appeared, he was attacked with a dog-whip by an enraged citizen, the following account of which appeared in the Tribune:

"Mr. A. A. Clason, of the firm of Clason & Paine, 31 Wall street, attacked James Gordon Bennett, yesterday morning, at the corner of Maiden Lane and Nassau street. Mr. Clason has been contemptuously alluded to several times by the Herald in connection with the affair of McLachlan and Templeton, and yesterday morning the parties met, and Clason

'Drew a dog-whip

and struck Bennett, who put up his arms and attempted to cover his face with his cloak, exclaiming, 'None of your nonsense.' After some half dozen blows, the whip broke and the affair was over—Bennett coolly picking up Mr. Clason's hat, which had fallen off in the fray, into the mud, and handed it to its owner."

*In the Encyclopædias Noah's name is given as Mordecai Manuel Noah.

WHAT IS THE LURE OF THE TABLOID PRESS?

Pictures, To Be Sure, But Even More, News Shorn of Waste Verbiage, Say Editors of the New Type—Economic Conditions Will Force Its Universal Adoption Within a Few Years, They Believe

WHY is a tabloid?

What is the lure of this half-size newspaper?

Why do more New Yorkers, for instance, buy the five-year-old Daily News than any other of the older dailies?

What kind of people read tabloid newspapers? Are they all "gum-chewers" as the editor of Time describes them, or are they Sweeneys and Stuyvesants, Morgans and Cohens, as the advertising manager of the New York Daily News declares?

Can the tabloid say it with pictures only, or are news stories which defy the camera necessary to popular acceptance?

Can the tabloid newspaper along present metropolitan lines succeed in smaller cities?

How many page layouts of news pictures need be used to attract and hold attention, without undue expense?

Can the total number of pages be increased indefinitely without loss of the tabloid identity?

How many columns can be included in a page with an eye to symmetry, readability and economy?

Are long train rides between home and business essential to success of a tabloid?

What contributions have been made by tabloid journalism toward the science of newspaper publication and to the public welfare?

These and kindred questions were recently submitted by EDITOR & PUBLISHER to the editors and managing editors of the half-dozen tabloid daily newspapers which have appeared and lived since the armistice. Their answers, direct and illuminating, are given below. Before taking them up, however, it may be well to trace briefly the course that this journalism has followed during its early American career.

It is not new. Tabloid journalism was established in England even before the war and the Daily Graphic, Daily Mirror and Daily Sketch are circulation leaders in London. In the United States, tabloid format has been employed for years by picture periodicals and for almost 20 years by Women's Wear, a New York textile trade daily, has followed this style, with 5 columns to the page.

None of these had developed the news technique that marks the tabloids of 1924, all of which are modelled to a great extent upon the Daily News of New York, which in turn took its early inspiration from the London picture papers. During its first 5 years, which ended June 26, this newspaper has long since turned its eyes from England and has evolved its own thorough-going scheme of operation.

None of the American tabloids has shunned the possibilities inherent in tales and pictures of ladies in bathing suits or in difficulties that bring them before "the authorities." None of them ignores the news element in murder or triangular amours. Some of them do scrub the hide of a "juicy" story until the blood runs, but all of them prefer not to be known as "yellow journals." The New York Mirror avows entertainment as its chief mission, but the others stress news, and in their own ways, avoid the marks that people associate with sensationalism—for instance the diagram with cross indicating the corpus delicti.

The success of the New York News has been duplicated on a smaller scale in other centers, though some attempts to imitate it have met disaster. In Seattle, the American, which floundered for a year before starting, managed to live only a few weeks before the mortician was summoned. In Baltimore the Times was equally short-lived, its backers apparently in deep and complete ignorance of the field and the medium. For days the paper appeared without a local picture or story of importance. The Baltimore Post, a Scripps-Howard evening tabloid which took the mark with the Times, felt its way, studied its field and is now enjoying, after 2 years, a measure of prosperity.

Similar conduct marked the Scripps-Howard Daily News in Washington, which is also on the road to success.

In Des Moines, the News, an old-established Scripps-Howard paper, switched from regular to tabloid make-up and back again within a year, with indifferent results.

Detroit's Daily Ledger gasped only a few breaths before finding the pace too fast.

The American in St. Louis also suspended recently after a brief experience.

Boston's experience has been unique. The venerable Morning Advertiser, kept alive by W. R. Hearst as a four-page paper with negligible circulation for the sake of its Associated Press membership, suddenly bloomed as a tabloid. Next Hearst purchased the Evening Record, companion to the Advertiser in a prior existence, and converted it also to tabloid format. Then Hearst's Evening American put out a nearly edition sold in competition with the tabloid Advertiser, while its later editions vied with the tabloid Record. This trial and error method resulted in the expunging of the Record after a few weeks, the transfer of its A. P. membership to the American and undisputed possession of the tabloid field to the Advertiser. The latter has had a slow and somewhat irregular growth during four years.

Meanwhile, on the Pacific Coast, Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr., stepped up to show the old timers how to do business, combining purity and profits in journalism. He sold 150,000 advance six months subscriptions for his Illustrated Daily News to the people of Los Angeles, which appeared last September as a two-cent morning paper. Apparently, his policies of clean news won the approval of more folks than the members of the women's clubs who first endorsed them, for his circulation reports claim well over 200,000 copies sold daily. Its price is now one cent. Advertising is carried in fair volume.

In San Francisco, Vanderbilt launched the Illustrated Daily Herald last December, and, in accordance with his slogan "The Public Be Served," he has kept his readers fully informed on a number of alleged plots to end the existence of that paper. The young man appears to like personal journalism and is quoted frequently in his own columns. This paper claims 150,000 circulation at one cent a copy.

Vanderbilt's future plans call for similar newspapers in Detroit and Seattle, at least, and probably in other cities as his earlier ventures become established.

And latest among the metropolitan tabloids is the Daily Mirror in New York, under the Hearst aegis. Hardly a month old, it should not be given much more here than the mention that a number of the most capable Hearst officers have it in charge and that it has had the close attention of Mr. Hearst's three oldest sons. Its infant lineaments are similar to those of its five-year-old contemporary, the Daily News. It is geared to high speed.

Which brings us back to this precocious scion of the 77-year-old Chicago Tribune, whose co-editors and publishers, Col. R. R. McCormick and Capt. J. M. Patterson, found the energy, money, and brains to give New York a new kind of newspaper. Capt. Patterson has been the genius of most of the promotion that gave this daily a firm foothold and sent its circulation climbing in bounds of 100,000 copies.

Philip A. Payne, who has been with the paper almost from its birth and has been its managing editor for the past two years, and by that token speaks with authority, has this to say of the tabloid:

"Sir Philip Gibbs was the most popular war correspondent because he painted a vivid word-picture of the struggles he witnessed. His pictorial pen gave readers of his stories a mental picture of the war. To envision the war as Gibbs saw it, however, readers had to spend an hour or more reading columns of type. Had the News existed in war days, its readers would have seen at a glance scenes from the great battles; they would have seen the tired soldiers Gibbs described and all the other phases of the war. No written words would have equalled the vividness of the picture.

"That paragraph is in part an answer to your questions:

"'What is the lure of the tabloid newspaper for the public? Are the pictures the chief attraction?'

"Certainly pictures are the chief attraction, for they are the very essence of tabloidism.

"Every good picture is a story told in a flash, with the added value of having given the reader the feeling of a person actually seeing the event.

"A large part of the lure is based on the feeling it gives the readers of being eye-witnesses to the big news of the day.

"It is true that certain big stories cannot be covered satisfactorily by the use of pictures and captions exclusively. The Democratic convention was a sample of the kind of story that needs a great deal of type-telling, too. Yet it is safe to say that the conventions this year were presented to the public more clearly than any others, due to the increased use of pictures by all newspapers.

"Editors of the News are trained to think in terms of pictures all the time. There are few stories, even of the statistical type, that cannot be pictured in some way; if not by the camera, then by an artist.

"Stories such as the Wall street explosion, the funeral of President Harding and the Lorain tornado can be told much more effectively in pictorial form. Editors of all newspapers, including the most conservative, are realizing this and devoting more and more space to pictures.

"The tabloid newspaper has come to stay and is going to grow so that within the next ten years every city of importance will have one. I do not think the tabloid can prosper in a city of less than 500,000 population. It is the hustle and bustle of a metropolis that has much to do with tabloid success. The rush of a big city makes most readers want their news in such a form that they can grasp it quickly.

"During the Democratic convention, every New York newspaper devoted from 5 to 10 pages daily to the story. I venture to say that not more than one out of every hundred readers of the regular dailies had the time to wade through this mass of type, much of which was repetition. The News presented to its readers all of the essential facts and many features of the convention, but we did try to avoid repetition. Brevity, next to pictures, has most to do with a tabloid's success. It is the tendency to print overwritten stories that is going to make the tabloid more popular.

"With pictures alone a tabloid could not gain the vast circulation of more than 800,000 daily that the News has acquired in five years. The public must be supplied with all the news of the day. A careful check on the columns of the News will show editors that practically every important story carried in any other metropolitan newspaper is carried in tabloid form.

"Every day a report is received by me giving a detailed list of all stories printed in other New York newspapers with a check against any the News did not carry. There are few check marks on these reports. We try to make the News 100 per cent informative and to keep out of its columns anything that could be considered dull.

"EDITOR & PUBLISHER asked among other things, if long subway or train rides between homes and business are necessary for success of a tabloid. Such rides are no more necessary for the suc-

YOURS TRULY

When I was the devil in a small town plant
In the days of the old print shop,
I was sticking type about half the time
And the other half pushing the mop!
I pushed that mop till the floor was clean,
Then I took my take like a man,
And I stuck my thousand in an hour, too,
Right along with the clean-cased clan.

And I was a devil of a devil, too,
When brevier was the pin-point size;
And many a time I have shown type lice
With a squirt in a new boy's eyes!
And many a time I have lingered long
When the work of the day was done,
At the Gentlemen's Club of the old print shop,
Jeffing on the make-up stone!

Now where is the devil of the old hand type?
He has gone with the Dinosaur!
He sleeps with the Dodo . . . he has gone his way
To be seen in the shop no more!
And the old kick press in the junk heap lies,
And there it will rust and lie
Till the printers jump at Gabriel's horn
And the form is a mess of pi!

When I was the devil! . . . O the memories fair
In the smell of the old print shop!
When I stuck brevier about half the time
And the other half, pushed the mop!
Let the world wag on as it will, but I
Shall dream when I may, and smile
With love for the devilish little devil I was,
Back yonder a devil of a while!

BAD WEATHER CUT SPRING BUSINESS LINEAGE STATISTICS INDICATE

New York and Other Cities Show Great Improvement in June Over Earlier Period, Even Discounting Extra Sunday Last Month

TEN of the thirteen Greater New York newspapers whose advertising was measured by the New York Evening Post Statistical Department carried more business during the first six months of 1924 than in the same period of 1923. While the combined deficit of the three papers showing losses was 1,348,422 lines, the net loss for the 13 living and three deceased newspapers was 2,314,690 lines. The total business handled by the newspapers during the first six months was 82,044,390 lines, against 84,359,080 lines in 1923, when the Globe, Evening Mail and Herald had not lost their entities. The net decrease in the amount of business amounted to 2.7 per cent.

For the month of June, the net loss of the same dailies was only 145,806 lines, or about 1 per cent, due no doubt to the fact that June, 1924, had five Sundays against four in the same month of 1923. Totals for 1923 and 1924 for the month were 13,418,436 lines and 13,564,242 lines.

Paper consumption for the 6 months dropped, as indicated in the number of pages—84,444 in 1923 and 81,276 in 1924. The decrease is about 5 per cent. June dropped from 13,532 to 13,350.

Comparative tables by newspapers for the six months and for June appear in an adjoining column.

Indications that business has recovered somewhat from its spring lull appear in the Evening Post figures for May and June covering 134 newspapers in 29 cities. Nineteen of the cities listed show losses for May; in June the losses decreased to 15. The five Sundays for June 1924, against four in June, 1923, no doubt contributed to the favorable showing. May's loss of 4,091,558 lines was cut to 53,791 in June.

Unfavorable weather throughout the country during May and early June is considered as a very tangible factor in cutting down newspaper advertising. Department store sales and street car receipts in several middle western cities showed marked decrease in April and May from the totals of the same month last year, paralleling the drop in newspaper lineage.

Better weather conditions during the latter part of June and early July will no doubt be reflected in the July lineage, which, it is indicated, will be about equal to that of July, 1923.

May and June statistics for the 29 cities follow:

NEWSBOYS' BAND SAILS

Canadian Organization to Play at Empire Exposition, Wembley

Only one Canadian band has so far been engaged to play at the British Empire Exhibition, the Edmonton, Alberta, Newsboys' Band, which is now en route to London, England, to fill a four weeks' engagement at the big exposition. It was organized by J. Michaels, a newsboy, a native of New York City, but who went to Edmonton 12 years ago.

There are fifty-one boys in the band, everyone of whom is a bona fide "newsy."

Michaels, who sailed with the boys, has made money in Edmonton and has given thousands of dollars to the band. For the trip to England he put up $6,000 against the $9,000 subscribed by the people of Edmonton. Before he went to Western Canada he sold papers in Herald Square, New York.

JAPAN NOT SHUNNING U. S. GOODS

Efforts of Hoodlums to Inflame Mob Sentiment Futile — Newspapers Almost Unanimous in Calm Comments

By JOHN R. MORRIS
(Far Eastern Editor, EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

TOKYO, June 20.—Abortive attempts of a few groups to instigate a boycott of American goods in Japan has had no appreciable effect on either the sale of American products here or the amount of American advertising published in the country's newspapers. Reaction to the enactment of the new immigration bill has been confined to resentment against the American Congress for the national slight most Japanese read into the exclusion clause.

The origin of the so-called boycott has been with small groups of young hoodlums, who are able to create for the moment an atmosphere of excitement altogether out of proportion to any tangible scheme of action of which they are capable.

There is no doubt that this fact is fully realized by every Japanese who is in any position to have the slightest effect on American-Japanese trade. The Tokyo Chamber of Commerce has taken a strong stand publicly against any movement looking towards a boycott.

The Japanese newspapers, with notably few exceptions, are doing everything in their power to point out the danger to Japan which lurks in the irresponsible vapories of the anti-American agitators. While the feeling against the exclusion clause was at its height, the editors of the Jiji Shimpo organized a meeting of all the Tokyo papers' editors, where an agreement to discuss the immigration question coolly and moderately was reached.

The Hochi Shimbun this week devoted an entire page to arguments against confusing American-Japanese diplomacy and American-Japanese trade.

NEWSPAPER TYPOGRAPHY AND MAKE-UP

Appreciation of Attractive Typography and Make-Up Greater Now Than Ever Before—Marked Improvements Noted in Many Papers—Difference Between Typography and Typesetting

By H. FRANK SMITH

Article XVI

EDITORIAL NOTE—Mr. Smith is a special lecturer in the department of Advertising and Marketing at New York University. Newspaper typography in all its phases will be discussed in this department in the last issue of each month. Complete newspapers, as well as individual items, such as headings, advertisements, editorial pages, features, etc., will be reviewed, and good and bad examples illustrated and commented upon. Publishers, editors, advertisers and readers are invited and urged to send in specimens and to take full advantage of the author's desire to help them with their type problems and make-up.

ADDRESS INQUIRIES TO H. FRANK SMITH, EDITOR & PUBLISHER, NEW YORK.

Replies Cannot Be Made by Mail

[N reviewing the many newspapers that reach our desk each month it is xtremely gratifying to note the sincere ffort on the part of publishers, editors, ompositors, make-up men, and others, o refine and improve the typographical ppearance of newspaper pages.

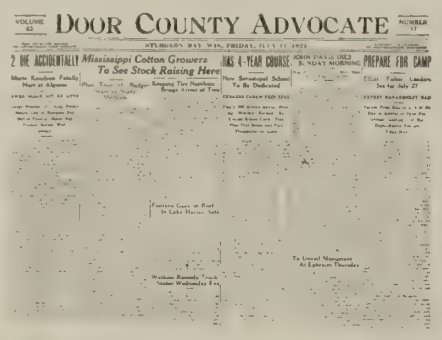
Apparently it is being recognized more nd more that there is a very great difference between writing a piece of copy —whether news, editorial, feature, head, d, or something else—and transforming his copy into an attractive piece of composition—whether an entire page, or merely a small portion of a page.

Not so long ago, when copy was oked, was cut into "takes," rushed to the omposing room, and put into type in the uickest possible way—with little or no egard for such important details as eader interest and advertising values. hat was typesetting.

Today the keen newspaper executive ees to it that copy is accompanied by a ayout incorporating some of the fundaental principles of good typography that nake for attractiveness, easy stimulating eading—such as suitable type faces and elated decorative material, proper disribution of white space and margins, orm and arrangement, etc., which is nown as typography.

Difference Between Typography and Typesetting

TYPOGRAPHY is altogether different from typesetting. To begin with, ypography is concerned more particularly with the presentation of a message, n type—the visualization of an idea—nd the consideration of the best ways nd means to present that message (put ver that idea) in the most favorable anner, so that the greatest number of eaders will get it quick; and not overooking the very important fact that this essage is likely to be in competition ith a great many other items on the ame page, or in the same column.



Typography means planning and plotting the idea on paper in the form of a arefully thoughtout layout. This does ot mean creating something "pretty," owever, nor developing one of those clever stunts" that every one looks at nd pays no attention to. Some of the ost successful typography is done with he simplest of materials—in fact, a great eal of it is done this way—a simple ead or illustration, ordinary unadorned ody type, and no border or decoration hatever. Look over some newspapers nd note that the big and little ads that ominate the pages are usually set in a imple, quiet, dignified way. This aplies to all the other typographic details, oo. There is power in simplicity—even n newspaper typography and makeup.

Typography merely means thoughtful onsideration of a good type face for isplay, an easily-read type face for the ody, both faces set in proper measures nd carefully spaced, illustrations posioned to the best advantage and with reasonable regard for balance, the proper disribution of white space and margins, and ne selection of a suitable border that ill harmonize with the type faces and lustrations. These are some of the funamentals of good typography.

Typesetting is merely the assembling of ese items into justified units, and is ne of the least important details of ypography.

When newspaper folks, especially those n the composing room, get better acuainted with the splendid possibilities of ood typography (as distinguished from ere typesetting) newspaper pages will ecome more and more attractive, reader nterest will be greatly stimulated, and dvertising results increased not to menion the resultant economies of time, labor and money.

COMMENT AND CRITICISM

A Review of Newspapers With the Idea of Making Friendly and Helpful Suggestions to Improve Typography and Make-Up

Sumner J. Harris, Door County Advocate, Sturgeon Bay, Wis.—Regarding the particular question you raised (whether the lead paragraph should follow the left or the right of a double-column head) I agree with your foreman; that is, I would follow the left side of the head, as your proofsheet shows and which your foreman says is right. There does not seem to be any good reason why you could not let the lead follow the right side (or end) of a double-column head, except that make-up practice on suburban weeklies as well as metropolitan dailies seems to prefer having the lead follow the left side (or beginning) of a double-column head. Some papers modify this practice when the double column head comes on the right-hand side of the page, when they make-up the lead to follow the right-hand (or end) of the head. Of course if the double-column head comes in the two last right-hand columns (5 and 6 in your paper) the lead would follow the end of the head, which you of course know. (See Figs. 1, 2 and 3.) Incidentally the typography and make-up of the Advocate is very well done. I think I would put a 2-column head over my classified—you carry enough to make a big feature of this department.

T. R. Longcope, Advertiser, Boston.—I do not see anything important that can be done to your classified to improve it. Your pages have what I like to call a "wallop" in them. I think I would put a 1-point face rule above and below the major heads like "Automotive," "Business Service," etc., just to let these heads stand out a little better so a fellow could find what he is looking for easier—and, maybe, quicker.

Charlton Wright, Sunday Record, Charleston, S. C.—The July 13 issue of the Record looked very good, considering the 44 pages in five sections it carried. The typography and make-up compares very favorably with the better metropolitan papers, and the only thing that might be refined is the choice of type used in most of your ads—too many different styles and sizes are used in individual ads. Composing room should be more careful to use only the same faces or "families" in any one ad. Your masthead could also be improved—especially the title, which seems all worn and twisted out of shape.

News-Record, Miami, Okla.—Why not kill those 12-point solid mourning borders that you use around the ads of Coyne, Eagle-Pilcher, Commerce Mining and Royalty Co., and N. E. O., in your June 22nd issue and use instead a light-face border similar to Coca-Cola and Skelton? You would improve the attractiveness of the News-Record wonderfully if you did. And when you use the light-face border leave out the 24-point solid squares used for corners in the ad of Amalgamated Lead-Zinc Smelters. These big solid black corners were never intended for a light-face border, or any border for that matter. Your society, sport, local, and mining pages were very attractively handled—and proves that you folks know how to do it right.

Wm. N. Tyler, Review, Jackson Heights, N. Y. City.—For the size and kind of a publication that the Review is, I would say that you are handling the typography of the heads about as well as could be expected—although this does not mean that I would not use a "streamer" for the first page whenever I got a chance to put a little scream in some news item of particular and special local interest (like the opening of the Cross Bay Boulevard, for instance). While the general appearance of the Review is excellent, there are some little refinements which easily can be made; like setting the title on your masthead in the same style of type used for title on front page and enclosing the whole masthead in a border instead of only part of it; put a real head over your classified; use only 1-point face rules around all your ads.—making the borders uniform. These are merely minor matters, but the appearance of the Review would be improved if you followed my suggestions.

George W. Greene, Press, New London, Wis.—Generally speaking there is nothing very serious in the Press to criticize. If I were you I would kill all the mourning borders you allow to creep in occasionally. Mourning borders never helped an advertiser in a local paper to sell anything. Your make-up is good—especially the pyramiding of the ads. Your first pages also are commendable. In the issue of June 19 I believe it would have been better to put the Manawa story in the 8th column, to follow end of streamer head, and to have put the Mail Robbery story in columns 1 and 2. Am glad to note you are progressive enough to use upper and lower case for your heads—even the streamers. Just kill the funeral borders, and the Press will stack up with the best of them so far as good typography and careful make-up is concerned.

QUIBBLES BANISHED IN NEW LABOR COURT

Impartial Body of 12 Men Will Furnish Three Judges From Outside Newspaper Business to Decid Promptly Pressroom Disputes Which Deadlock Standing Bi-Partisan Board

By ARTHUR ROBB

PROMINENT as the proverbial bandaged thumb while New York newspaper publishers and their pressmen were bickering last year over details of the present and future working contracts, was the fact that no permanent or adequate machinery existed for the prevention of prompt adjudication of such disputes. The main award over which so much controversy arose was written by a Judge of the U. S. Circuit Court; supplementary and supposedly clarifying documents were penned by this judge, by associates on the Federal bench in New York, and by learned members of the State Supreme Court, with weeks' or months' delay between complaint and decision. None of the decisions satisfied the union—possibly that was too much to expect of the old local of the New York pressmen—and each of them led to fresh attempts at harassing pressroom operations.

GEORGE L. BERRY

That's a story definitely in the past. There is no local union of New York pressmen at present and the international officers have acted in arbitration of the wage question, which was the only problem left unsolved after the agreement ending the strike last Fall. The three-year contract and the wages it provided were noted in EDITOR & PUBLISHER last week. Other provisions were published last October. These data, ordinarily the meat of a story on labor negotiations, are insignificant beside the news that publishers and employes had agreed upon a complete and detailed plan for obtaining impartial and speedy determination of industrial questions.

The idea received considerable attention last summer when negotiations for a new wage and working contract were at their height. The publishers, always uncertain as to whether their press crews were available from day to day, suggested a permanent three-man board for the hearing and judgment of all disputes. That was the germ of the Printing Commission whose composition and duties are defined at length in the new contract.

Major George L. Berry, president of the International Printing Pressmen's Union, equally anxious to bring stable conditions in the city employing the largest number of web pressmen in the world, had a similar idea, which he developed in great detail, and it was his plan, in essence, which has been adopted, and the debt to him is publicly acknowledged by the publishers.

Primary jurisdiction over all disputes is vested in a Joint Conference Committee, composed of one representative of the New York local union, one representative of the international union, and two representatives to be named by the publishers. So far that differs little from the conciliation bodies familiar to all publishers, except that it is a four-man board and that the international union is represented.

One week is allowed this board for decision of any dispute submitted to it, except differences concerning amendment or extension of the present contract, for which 30 days is allowed.

If the Joint Conference Committee cannot render a decision within the week, jurisdiction is automatically transferred toa the Printing Commission. This includes, besides the four members of the joint conference committee, three impartial. disinterested persons. chosen by lot by the four committee members, or, if they cannot act, by the Mayor or Acting Mayor of New York. This official will select three members by lot from a panel submitted to him of men who have no interest or personal or business relations with any newspaper, or any publisher or union.

The panel submitted to the Mayor is to be selected within thirty days after July 17, the date of the contract, by the joint conference committee and it is to include twelve men whose prescribed qualifications are that they shall be "broadminded men of judicial or business or professional experience, and of practical experience in settling disputes." The three men to be added to the Joint Conference Committee to form the Printing Commission are to be chosen by lot on the first business day after completion of the panel. The other nine members of the panel are to be held in reserve in case substitutes are required.

After three months, the first three-impartial members of the commission, or any of them may be removed on request of either party to a dispute, and the vacancy filled by lot from the remaining members of the panel. If this remainder is reduced to three men, a new panel making a total of 12 is to be chosen.

And, if the joint conference committee can't agree within thirty days upon the first panel, the Governor of New York is to be requested to appoint twelve persons or as many of the 12 as the committee fails to nominate.

The Printing Commission of seven members will organize with a president and secretary selected from the three impartial members within 10 days, and will sit, if called by either party, during the first and third week of each month to hear any disputes referred to it.

All of which is merely the winding of the clock-spring. The tick that results is something quite novel in industrial conferences. "Efforts to reach a decission immediately shall be made after the conclusion of the hearing of any case," the contract provides. "When a decision is reached it shall be immediately announced orally, and the three impartial members shall by majority or unanimous vote be recorded as casting a single vote." No minority report is to be recorded.

The commission is directed to prepare, with the co-operation of all its seven members, its findings in clear, workable, unmistakable terms, and its decisions will bind on both parties. Failure of either party to enfore a decision within a week breaks the contract. Disputes over the meaning or application of a decision are to be referred back promptly to the commission.

The three impartial members of the printing commission are to be paid $25 each for each session they hold.

Pending appeals to the Printing Commission, orders given by the foreman responsible for the issue raised shall be obeyed and all work continued without interruption or curtailment, the contract directs.

Another sharp tooth is present for prevention of trivial complaints to the Commission. The Commission is empowered to assess against the party presenting the trivial or unjust complaint the entire cost of the session. Otherwise, the expense is shared equally by publishers and union.

When the commission receives an appeal from a foreman's order, it is directed to ascertain whether the order was obeyed, even under protest, and if it is proved that the order was not promptly executed, the appeal is to be summarily dismissed and the discipline enforced by the foreman is to stand. The Commission is the final judge as to whether a foreman's order is in conflict with the contract.

A new provision of what might be called the statutory law of the industry appears in the power vested in the Joint Conference Committee or the Commission to compensate an employe for obe ience to an unjust, unreasonable, or illeg order of a foreman. If the office do not adjust the difference, the committ or the commission can restore pay lo by the employe during unemployme consequent to the order, and may in a dition, penalize the office by awarding week's extra pay to the wronged unic member.

Balancing this provision is one that union member found guilty by the con mittee or the commission of disobeying just, reasonable, or legal order of th foreman, in addition to the disciplii imposed by the foreman, be fined or week's pay, to be given to any charit named by the commission.

Organization of a new local union i New York will probably be undertake in the near future, replacing the old N 25 which went out of existence last Se tember with the suspension of its charte for the unauthorized strike against th newspapers. Constitution of such a bod appears to be essential to the legal con position of the joint conference committe and the Printing Commission under th contract.

Members of both bodies will in all likel hood be named by the parties to the cor tract without resort to the Governor o the Mayor, it is believed.

PRESS AIDS VETERANS WITH BONUS BLANKS

Dailies in Several Sections of the Country Gain Good Will by Helping Applicants with Involved Questionnaires

Former soldiers and sailors again confronted with the mysteries of military paper-work in the application blanks just issued by the War and Navy Departments for the Federal bonus are receiving assistance from their daily newspapers. Incorrect answers, applicants are warned by the government, will result in the blank being returned for amendment, with all the delay that such a step involves.

This help is being extended by the Hearst newspapers, which favored the bonus measure during its stormy passage through Congress and over the President's veto, but it is also being given by other newspapers which fought the bonus as an economic wrong prior to its enactment.

In the latter class are the Brooklyn Eagle and the Oklahoma City Oklahoman. The experience of the latter in the campaign is related to Editor & Publisher by Walter M. Harrison, its managing editor.

Mr. Harrison, swamped by inquiries as to the "when, where, and how" of filing bonus applications, attempted first to have Washington designate the newspapers as the distribution agency for the blanks, but made no headway until he obtained the co-operation of the local American Legion posts.

Blanks were secured through the local post and announcement was delayed until enough were on hand to supply every veteran in the Oklahoman's community. A dozen stations were placed throughout the busy sections of the city, manned with Legion men, and a three-day publicity campaign preceded the distribution. Three more days were devoted to placing the blanks in the hands of applicants and on the fourth day the Oklahoman opened "bonus headquarters" in a big store room, donated for the purpose, on Main street. Twenty-five stenographers were drafted from a business college, Legion men served in various capacities, and the Oklahoman drilled a dozen men in all the intricacies of the bonus law. The Oklahoman also provided luncheon for the workers and morning and afternoon publicity during the week.

Six thousand blanks were filled during the week.

"If a similar method is not adopted in every community and sponsored by the livest newspapers in the country," thinks Mr. Harrison, "bonus blanks will be straggling in for the remainder of the year. This, of course, will greatly complicate the work of the departments at Washington.

"One of the major benefits of such a tie-up to the newspaper is the gratification of the local Legion posts. On account of our inability to see eye to eye with the American Legion in its fight for a bonus, it was the general local impression that we were against the American Legion. Of course, that was an erroneous impression, but nevertheless a deep-seated impression of our antagonistic attitude toward the bonus. By our leadership in organization of this local bonus campaign, I think that the unjustified ill-feeling has been entirely eliminated.

"One of the important things to do in the starting of this campaign is the publication of a specimen blank, properly filled out. This requires five newspaper columns, fourteen or fifteen inches deep and makes an ugly feature. But, judging from the number of calls for mats from smaller newspapers over the state and from the number of soldiers who came into headquarters with this sheet cut out, it is of great value."

"TAMPA" MISUSE CURBED

U. S. Trade Commission Issues "Desist" Order to Cigar Companies

Alleged misuse of the word "Tampa" and "Havana" in marking and advertising cigars has caused the Federal Trade Commission to issue a "cease and desist" order against C. N. Dellinger & Co. of Red Lion, Pa., and Tampa Ribbon Cigar Company of Indianapolis. C. N. Dellinger, head of the Pennsylvania concern and John M. Thomas, president of the Indianapolis company, are named individually by the commission.

It is charged that the Dellinger concern, which manufactures cigars of domestic tobacco worked with the Tampa Ribbon Cigar Company to sell and distribute them with labels and through advertising that actually represented the goods as so-called Tampa cigars, or cigars made in Tampa of Cuban grown tobacco, commonly known as "Havana" in the cigar trade.

By LUCILE BRIAN GILMORE

WILLIAM A. CURLEY: "Good jobs go to the loyal."

ASK William A. Curley, managing editor, as to what he attributes the success of the Chicago Evening American, and he will tell you:

"Our organization."

Yet this same Mr. Curley went to Los Angeles in 1911 to take charge of the Los Angeles Herald, only then recently acquired by William Randolph Hearst, and in two years the Herald was the leading afternoon paper.

From Los Angeles Mr. Curley went to San Francisco and put the also acquired San Francisco Call on its feet. Then he headed for Chicago, took charge of the Evening American, and now, at 3 cents a copy daily and 5 cents on Saturdays, the American, which was selling at 1 cent when Mr. Curley took charge in 1914, is leading all its competitors in circulation.

And Mr. Curley didn't carry his organization with him from newspaper to newspaper. He built up a new one at each stopping-off place.

His present organization in the editorial department of the Evening American numbers several men who were on the staff when he took charge in February, 1914.

Many others are eight and nine-year men, who started newspaper work under Mr. Curley. Others are boys who went away to the World War—and returned to the American, of course. You couldn't drive them away.

"Mr. Curley puts great stress upon the organization," said one of his assistants. "He is very proud of it, and lays much of the success of the American to the organization.

"He doesn't go outside the organization for help, but when vacancies occur, he fills them by promotion from the ranks. The ranks are filled up by new blood, of course, but the better jobs go to the loyal members of the force. That goes down even to the office boys. Several former copy-chasers now are successful reporters."

A "bear" on accuracy, the managing editor of the Evening American believes in taking as much pains with a 50-word brief as with a leading murder or political story. And he wants every story entertainingly written.

"He knows what he wants, he knows how to tell others what he wants, and he knows when he gets it," said one of the aides. "He has an unusual faculty for constructive criticism. And he knows how to listen to the other fellow, accept his idea gratefully if it is right, or reject it tactfully, without leaving a sore spot if he thinks it wrong."

And he listens to ideas from any of his staff. He is democratic. Any reporter, re-write man, copy-reader can talk to him, any time—because he's on the job all the time when not elsewhere on business for Mr. Hearst. For in addition to being managing editor of the Evening American, he supervises the editorial policy of the Milwaukee Wisconsin Evening News and of the Atlanta Georgian.

Mr. Curley is a great reader, and an asker of questions. He is a keen student of people generally, continually asking questions about persons whom he has not seen or met, and he has a surprising number of friends and acquaintances in Chicago.

Born in New York 49 years ago, Mr. Curley started newspaper work while quite young on the old New York Recorder. For a short time he was in the advertising business. Then, 26 years ago, he went to the sporting department of the New York American. He has been in the employ of William Randolph Hearst continuously since.

After serving as sporting editor, make-up editor, night editor and assistant managing editor on the New York American he went to Los Angeles in 1911, then to San Francisco in 1913, thence to Chicago and the Evening American.

He is married, and the father of 5 children, three daughters and two sons. Bob, the younger boy, is a student at the University of Chicago, quarterback on the football team—and hence William A. Sr., former sporting editor, takes great pride in Bob.

In his organization to which he lays the success of the Evening American, he knows them all, from assistant managing editor to copy boy.

An annual stag banquet is held—he calls it a get-together meeting. At the last banquet, one chair was vacant—the chair of a veteran re-write man who had only recently died. As the toastmaster arose, Mr. Curley interrupted and arose, proposing a "Silent toast to one who has passed on—one who typified all the highest qualifications of the newspaper man."

He never forgets a member of his organization.

SPORTS WRITERS ORGANIZE

International Association Formed by News Men at Olympics

PARIS, July 9.—Opportunity has been taken of the presence in Paris of so large a number of sports writers of all countries to found an International Sports Writers' Association. One of the chief aims of this association is that sports writers of one country shall be placed on an equal footing with sports writers of any country they may visit. THE WORLD'S GREATEST MARKET

THE World's Greatest Market—there she sits in glory! Woo her and she will bring to you material blessings beyond dreams of avarice; spurn her and your way shall be lonely and your works futile and barren.

There she sits—in a New York subway car!

Let us survey this market: Her shoes are of the soft skin of the kid, exquisitely designed, with pointed toe, which no foot may fit, raised high in the heel to throw the human form out of joint, and colored a delicate pastel shade, dainty as a glove, and a thousand times removed from all suggestion of contact with the earth's soil or a dirty city street.

Two magnificently turned pedal extremities in silken casements, glistening like shafts of burnished metal, harmoniously blend with the bordering shoes and pleated skirt.

The gown is fashioned with the grace of a flower. One wonders if its contact with this soiled public carriage is not a desecration. It would seem more in place in a drawing room, amid appointments of carved mahogany, crystal chandeliers, polished floors and Persian rugs and soft tapestries spun of an ancient art.

There is a daring, freakish splash of color appliqued at the side of the skirt of the World's Greatest Market—a conventional design, caught from the fleur de lis and so delicately woven that the imagination pictures prolonged effort of patient, skilled fingers, although we realize that a tireless finger of steel has long since mercifully replaced the human touch. The gown is cut low and is sleeveless, revealing at the neck a fugitive marshmallow flash. The arms extend down to pointed, polished finger tips, pink as sea-shells.

The hat is a diadem, a confection reflecting dazzling prism lights, with lines and proportions so true to the form of face and head that it would seem to have been modelled from the imagination of a Gainsborough to charm Apollo and drive a thousand rivals to despair.

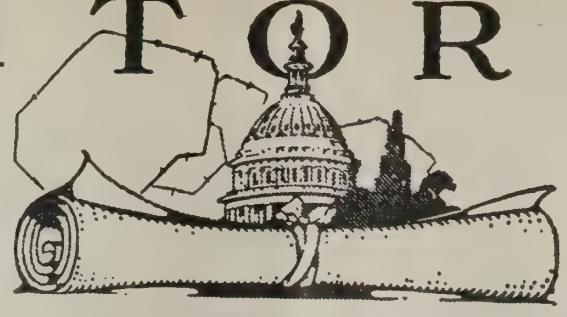
A sparkling solitaire, on the right finger, eloquently proclaims the conquest won and an array of jewelled boxes and beaded bags and silvered mirrors and dangling pearls and myriad touches of elegance and vanity declare in her the triumph of a Golden Age.

In her hand is a newspaper and her blue eyes flit from page to page, lingering here at a vision of a castle on a hill, stopping there to appraise the value of a modern kitchen appliance, swiftly discarding a style of motor car and with precision accepting another one—The World's Greatest Market is making her selections.

From the depth of the sea, from valley and plain, from mountain crag and darkening mine, from treetop and cave, from office and mill, from countryside and market place, through summer's heat and winter's blast, by day and by night, the legions march to lay their treasures at her feet and accept her gracious bounty.

The World's Greatest Market in the subway train is speeding to the canyons of Wall Street, as our survey is made. Today she shall copy his letters; tomorrow she shall be his Queen.

Mid-summer, and not many of the dire threats of the Presidential year Gloomy Gus brigade have been realized.



RADIO ADVERTISING

IN theory, the radio broadcaster is non-commercial, meaning non-advertising and non-propagandist.

Recently we heard a New York theatrical manager advertising over the radio by the smart expedient of soliciting the "prettiest girls" for the chorus of a new show.

Last week we heard broadcasting from a Broadway theatre, the announcer coming in about like this: "This is XYZ, broadcasting for Soandso's Theatre, Broadway and Forty-fifth street, the largest house on Broadway, where performances are given twice daily at popular prices, with seats for everyone."

Just how this business is sold, we do not know, but we dare say that it is as commercial as any other advertising medium.

CHAPTER I. 19-20.

Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the disputer of this world? Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of the world?

VALUATION STANDARDS

CAN newspaper earnings of the post-war period be considered as typical in valuing a property for reorganization or sale? Is the old rule that the average of five years' gross earnings indicates a property's fair worth still valid, considering the experience of newspapers from 1919 to date? EDITOR & PUBLISHER does not think so. The newspaper business has lost little of its hazardous character, even though its prosperity has multiplied since the Armistice. A fair valuation would take into consideration years of red as well as black balances, and recent years have seen comparatively few in the red.

For that reason careful newspaper men read with doubt in their minds a broker's announcement in the New York Times this week that he was offering 500 shares of Brooklyn Eagle stock, par value $100, at $180 per share. The capitalization of the Eagle is $1,500,000, on which an annual dividend of $10 is paid. The broker pointed out that net profits in 1923 were $285,648, on gross earnings of $4,110,738; in 1922, the net was $400,000 on a gross of $3,866,995; and in 1921, the net was $258,387, on a gross of $3,528,669.

Total assets were reported as $3,294,917, current assets at $1,200,000, and current liabilities at $111,466. Among the assets listed was the Eagle's Associated Press membership, valued at $1,000.

Net profits figured against the capitalization, showed a return equivalent to $19 a share in 1923; $26 a share in 1922; and $17 a share in 1921.

Figured against gross income, net earnings represent a profit on the annual turnover of more than 6 per cent in 1923; more than 10 per cent in 1922; and 7 per cent in 1921.

On the appraisal rule of averaging gross earnings for a given period, the three years' figures cited by the broker would warrant a goodwill valuation of $3,835,467.

Averaging the net earnings for this period cited by the stock salesman, and multiplying by 10, the goodwill might be valued at $3,146,780.

Averaging the results of both of these methods, the valuation would be $3,491,123.

So with figures like these in mind, the broker offers the stock as a bargain at $180, which figure, applied to the 15,000 shares outstanding or in the treasury, would value the goodwill of the paper at $2,700,000.

No one doubts for a moment that the Brooklyn Eagle goodwill is worth that sum; nor is there any doubt that its publishers would refuse for it a considerably larger amount. The point is that valuation of a newspaper according to the earnings of the period since the Armistice is unsound, that its general application would certainly inflate dangerously newspaper capital values and probably result in business disaster and a quick return to the day when a newspaper was the last venture on which an investor cared to risk his fortune.

The very fact that this stock, of a closely held company, is seeking a buyer in the open market, indicates that the ownership of the paper believes unsound the method by which the seller reached his valuation.

Do the American people read politics? They do, when they are interesting. The American people read anything that is interesting. They do not read anything which is not interesting.

ENGLISH IN COMICS

GROSS grammatical errors habitually appearing in newspaper comic strips and jokes are dominating the speech of the children of the country, making it virtually impossible for the schools to teach correct English, according to Miss Edith Spencer, a Los Angeles school teacher, who is seeking to enlist editors in a campaign to "clean up" the newspaper columns. She called at EDITOR & PUBLISHER office this week to urge this journal's support.

Miss Spencer's campaign grew out of a recent meeting of the National Educational Association at Washington, D. C. G. A. Lyon, associate editor of the Washington Evening Star, addressed the convention on what the schools can do for the newspapers in the way of training young men to write correct English. Miss Spencer answered with a talk on what the newspapers can do for the schools by eliminating the conscious grammatical errors placed in comic strips, which disseminate incorrect speech among school children much faster than teachers can eliminate it.

"Children in the Lafayette Junior High, during our Better English drive, often brought me comic strips with the statement that the cartoons would have lost none of their effectiveness had correct grammar been used," she declared.

"I am convinced that the newspaper reading done by children every day influences their speech more than what they are taught in school. If newspapers generally would eliminate the grossest errors, I am convinced the effect would be noticeable. It is an almost hopeless task for English teachers to correct habits of speech formed by children before they enter school."

A newspaper ban on the following five common errors is asked by Miss Spencer: "Ain't," "done," "seen," "was" for "were," and the double negative. With these "outlawed" by the newspapers, the Better English movement would be benefited, while at the same time newspaper features would lose none of their effectiveness, Miss Spencer believes.

Miss Spencer came to New York this week to attempt to personally interest newspaper editors in the movement. She told EDITOR & PUBLISHER it is her plan to appeal to the American Society of Newspaper Editors.

The Los Angeles school teacher is not an extremist in the matter of language, and declares no part of her campaign is directed against "slang."

"Slang abounds in the newspapers," she said, "but only in cases where it is actually vulgar, is not a menace to good speech. At its best, I think it adds spice to writing and talking.

"If newspapers would only concentrate on the elimination of the five errors previously mentioned they would be doing a cultural service."

The Value of Human Interest

The one thing more than any other which makes the rotogravure section eagerly sought for is the fact that pictures quickly tell an interesting story. Next to themselves, human beings are principally interested in other human beings and their activities, so that illustrations for rotogravure advertising are especially effective when they carry a human-interest appeal.

This photograph by Pondelicek for Quaker Oats Company tells its own story of Puffed Rice.

The above example taken from our recently published book, "Rotogravure—How and When to Use It." Advertisers and advertising agencies will find many additional things of interest in this book, which is sent free on request. Address Kimberly-Clark Company, Neenah, Wisconsin.

THEY HELPED BRIGHTEN LONDON

Hazel Adler and Bertha Berger, New Yorkers, were prominent among the advertising women at Wembley last week.

MERCHANT "JOLLIES" READERS IN AD COPY—THEY READ IT AND BUY

IF the proof of an advertisement is the reading of it, then the copy of F. P. Lawrence & Co., of Richland Center, Wis., pass the acid test.

"The first thing I look at when I get my paper each week," said a Richland Center woman recently, "is the Lawrence Company ad. I get more entertainment out of it than anything else in the paper."

Every reader or publisher of a country weekly knows that it is the locals which people read most. They want to hear what other folks are doing. Mr. Lawrence, appreciative of this, and also wise to the fact that people like to be jollied, started sometime ago a little local department of his own which gives news and amuses the reader while giving it. He heads it "Store News," and it is on the front page. He talks about his store—really talks.

Nearly always there is a surprise of some kind, or some customer's name is brought in, and there are always a few smiles. Once he told in a humorous way about a conversation he had with a woman who wouldn't pay her bill, giving her name. Another time he told of a prominent business concern which had taken away from him the right to sell a certain article of their's because "we were naughty boys and cut the price."

The paragraphs are friendly, confidential chat, well seasoned with good humor. The Lawrence Company has found there is a big pull behind them.

The following excerpts taken from "Store News" in March are typical of the kind of "stuff" the company is getting across:

"Say, young fellow, the next time you see mother try to fill the tea kettle with water and notice there is no knob on the lid and see that mother has a hard time to keep from burning her hand taking this lid off, just make up your mind that you will come in and spend 5 cents the next time you come to town and get mother a knob for the tea kettle.

"No milk pail should be used unless it is scalded around the top, under the rim, down the sides and around the bottom. No wooden bale should be on the handle. If you doubt any of the above, bring in an old pail you have used for a few weeks and let us show you that you have an accumulation of sour milk in these cracks. If we cannot do so we will give you a new pail as good as yours was when new, free.

"Sure we all like toast, and some of the best toast I ever had was made over an open fire in a toaster that cost 10 cents. We still have those 10-cent toasters, and you can use one in your kitchen stove, and then you will say 'yum, yum' as you eat the buttered dainty. Try it and see. For those who have electricity, we have electric toasters.

"We are the only place in Richland Center where you can buy a corn popper, popcorn, butter and salt. There is nothing finer than popcorn popped in butter, and you can pop it that way if you will get one of our sheet iron poppers.

"Some folks like potato mashers of the old solid wood type, but most people prefer the wire kind. Anyhow, you must have a potato buster, so come in and get one that will bust them good.

"Was counting the kinds of egg beaters we had the other day, and will you believe it we had 7 different kinds, and the price is from 10 cents to $1.

"A second-hand cook stove and a second-hand range we have for your inspection. The cook stove is all shined up. The range needs a little polish. If you want the range we will sell it for $5 less than if we polished it.

"Think of it, not a Round Corner range in the store that is not sold. But cheer up; we have more coming, and you will be able to get yours."

Vanderbilt Says "Go Ahead"

When Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr., was informed recently that Louis T. Grant, manager of the U. S. H. H. TAMMEN, CO-OWNER DENVER POST, DIES FOLLOWING OPERATION

Millionaire Publisher Was Vivid Figure in American Journalism—Once Circus Owner—Estate Valued at More Than $5,000,000

The Late H. H. Tammen

H. H. TAMMEN, editor and part owner with Fred G. Bonfils of the Denver Post, and one of the most widely known newspaper owners in the country, died Saturday, July 19, at his home in Denver after an illness of four months. He was 68 years old.

When Mr. Tammen's health began to fail early this spring he spent much of his time in travel in an effort to improve his condition. The attempt was fruitless, however, and three weeks before his death he underwent an operation at Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore. On Monday, July 14, he returned to Denver in the private car of J. Ogden Armour, a close personal friend. His condition did not improve and the end came early Saturday morning.

The death of the Denver editor marks the passing of a vivid personality from American journalism. Mr. Tammen was born in Baltimore in 1856, the son of Heye Henry and Caroline Tammen. His father was an attache of the Netherlands consular service in the United States.

When he was 14 years old his father died and young Tammen, at that time a student in Knapp's academy in Baltimore, refused to become a burden on his mother and decided to shift for himself. At the age of 17 he went to Philadelphia and engaged in the cafe business. But he longed to go West, and when he learned that Eastern capitalists had decided to build a fine hotel in Denver, to be called the Windsor, he sought and obtained the cafe concession.

He arrived in Denver in 1880 at the time of the opening of the Windsor, at that time considered the finest hotel west of the Mississippi river, and became an important figure in the life of the hotel, then a headquarters for business and politics. Among those whose close friendship Mr. Tammen won during the early days of the Windsor were Lord Dunraven, at that time owner of a large estate in Estes park; Col. William F. (Buffalo Bill) Cody, Senator Edward Wolcott and his brother, Henry Wolcott.

A showman at heart, Mr. Tammen himself was keenly interested in the material curiosities of the West, and in 1881 he founded the H. H. Tammen Curio Company, which he owned at the time of his death. In connection with his curio business, Mr. Tammen published a monthly magazine called the Great Divide, and numbered among his contributors the late Verner Z. Reed and Stanley Wood, then widely known as a writer of Western stories. This venture was unsuccessful, and Mr. Tammen sold the magazine to a Chicago publishing company. Years later he revived it as a weekly published in connection with the Denver Post.

During his days at the Windsor Mr. Tammen became acquainted with F. G. Bonfils, and when the two learned that the Denver Post was for sale they decided to enter into a partnership and buy it. This they did in 1895, at a time when the Post was published in a basement room on the site of what is now the Iris theatre, and when the editorial staff consisted of three men.

"Write what you see and what you think," Mr. Tammen told his staff. "If a thing is horrible, tell why it is horrible, and leave nothing to the reader's imagination. Nothing is too trival to interest some reader, and remember that more people are interested in a man falling and breaking his leg on Curtis street than are interested in a disaster in Egypt or China."

With this as its policy, the Denver Post prospered from the start.

But success as a publisher did not interfere with Mr. Tammen's liking for the show business. In 1903 he and his partner acquired the Sells-Floto circus, the management of which was largely in Mr. Tammen's hands.

Despite his deep interest, his unfailing enthusiasm and his natural ability as a showman, however, the circus did not prosper. After losing money continuously, the circus was sold in November 1920, and Mr. Tammen devoted most of his time to the Great Divide, leaving the greater share of the management of the Post to his partner.

About 1910 Tammen and Bonfils purchased the Kansas City Post, directing it in addition to their Denver paper until 1922, when they sold it to Walter S. Dickey, owner of the Kansas City Journal.

Mr. Tammen was known in Denver for his many charities. In 1921 he donated $100,000 for the erection of the Agnes Reid Tammen wing of the Children's Hospital, now completed.

Among the tributes printed in the Post following Mr. Tammen's death was one from Judge Ben Lindsey, in which he said:

"Harry Tammen was one of the biggest-hearted, most human men I ever knew. He was one of the most honest, most truthful men I ever knew. He was ever kind to children because he had the heart of a child. The children of Denver have lost a friend, but his work for the Children's Hospital will be a monument to his memory."

In his tribute to his partner, Fred G. Bonfils said, in part:

"Harry Tammen, my partner for 30 years, has gone into the 'Great Unknown.' Over there they will recognize and know him at once. He will smile as he looks in their faces and he will tell them the truth and say, 'I had some faults, but I loved my fellowman and I believed in men, women and children.'"

The funeral was held early this week. Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. J. Ogden Armour of Chicago. Mr. Tammen is survived by his wife, Mrs. Agnes Tammen, and a brother, Frank Tammen of Denver.

Besides his newspaper property, it is estimated he left a personal fortune of $5,000,000.

GREEK EDITOR DISCUSSES SIGNIFICANCE OF FOREIGN LANGUAGE PRESS

Declares It Does Not Compete Unduly With Local English Papers—Acts As Americanization Guide To Immigrants

By ADAMANTIOS TH. POLYZOIDES
Editor Atlantis, Greek Daily, New York

THE Foreign Language American Press sprang from the necessity of a large number of people of the same race and the same tongue, who came to America, and wanted to find their way in a new land, where everything, from the numbering of the streets to the finding of a job, was carried on in a new and a strange way, so diametrically different from what these people were accustomed to in their native countries.

Ignorant of the language of the country in which they found themselves, these immigrants wanted somebody to guide them, to show them the way, to assist them in getting acquainted with America.

The American press was closed to them, and to master the English language to the extent of being able to understand the contents of an American newspaper, was no easy job. But even in case where some of these immigrants succeeded in getting the meaning of a story in a New York daily, still that story was lacking in interest to the new comer. This is only natural for people who go to a foreign country even when they are familiar with its language. And I suppose that familiar as I am with Spanish, a Madrid paper could never give me the excitement of a New York headline in a New York paper.

Coming here from distant lands, eager to find their own people scattered throughout the width of the continent, anxious to secure employment with somebody who could understand their language, the immigrants needed some sort of a house organ, so to speak. This house organ was their newspaper.

That the Foreign Language American Press grew with immigration was to be expected, and therefore the 15 years between the close of the Spanish-American War and the opening of the World War saw the greatest expansion of this class of newspapers, numbering today more than 600 dailies and weeklies, and representing more than 35 languages from Arabic to Welsh. These papers have a combined circulation of 10 to 11 million, approximating one-tenth of the total of the population of the United States.

Some of these Foreign Language American papers are superior to those of the same language published in the old country. A German daily of New York is by far superior to those of Berlin in make-up in bulk, and even in quality and variety of its contents; and the same applies to most Italian papers published in America, and even to Greek.

That some, and at times most of the material of the Foreign Language American Press deals with European questions was to be expected, especially now when the whole of Europe is in turmoil; but it must be added that the general tone of the Foreign Language American Press is strongly and manifestly American. If there is any fault finding with conditions as they exist in the United States, that role is given to the American Press, and to our liberal magazines, who specialize in that sort of work. Those of the immigrants who find that America is not what they expected it to be, have only to work a little harder to get together the price of a return ticket back to their native land. The percentage of these disappointed seekers of modern Arcadia is, I think, in the now popular, or rather unpopular ratio, of half of one percent.

The Foreign Language American Press has given the immigrant his first ideas about American history and American form of government. It is from the columns of the paper printed in his mother tongue, that the immigrant first learned of the goodness of George Washington, the greatness of an Abraham Lincoln, the strenuousness of a Theodore Roosevelt, the idealism of Woodrow Wilson, the charm of a Warren Harding.

When the Great War came, there was no more loyal, enthusiastic, active and militant lot of newspapers than the great majority of our American papers printed in a rainbow of languages. That there were some black sheep I will readily admit; but that as the saying goes, happens even in the best regulated families.

Those who say that the Foreign Language American Press engages in undue competition with the local press, are in error, because as a rule these papers published in a foreign language are very small affairs in comparison with their English-language contemporaries. To follow the life of an American city, to be in the thick of our greater national life, the American paper is indispensable, and no immigrant will be without it within 6 months of his arrival to Ellis Island.

Lest I be suspected of making a saint out of the Foreign Language Press, I will say that it keeps some of the national characteristics of the race to which it belongs. This is only natural. A Hungarian paper cannot help giving news about Hungary any more than the New York Herald published in Paris, cannot fail to give the news of America more amply than any of the other French papers of the capital. But whereas the New York Herald of Paris is a foreign paper, published in France, a Foreign Language paper published in the United States is American throughout.

The majority of the editors of the Foreign Language American Press are American citizens; they are men who made a thorough study of the problems and of the conditions with which they have to deal. They can follow the foreign problems affecting our American life with a clearer vision, and with a better knowledge of the psychology of Europe in its dealings with the United States. The interests of these people and of this press are not beyond the Atlantic, but right here. It is a fact that during the controversy of the League of Nations, most of the Foreign Language Press of America stood against the League, because the editors of those papers knew perhaps better than their American colleagues, that European diplomacy being so eager to get America in, had something up its sleeve. This notion might have been mistaken, but it was the honest conviction of a class of Foreign Language newspaper men who knew and firmly believed that America could not obtain any advantage, and would rather lose by joining the League of Nations as at present constituted.

If, however, the Foreign Language American Press does give particular attention to news from the other side, it has a redeeming feature in the fact that it refrains from those extensive, highly colored, and copiously illustrated accounts of crimes, divorces, escapades, and other such items as make the bulk of our sensational press.

Supposing for a moment that the American press of Foreign Language was to suspend publication, what would happen? The readers of those papers would subscribe to foreign papers, published abroad, whose psychology and views would not be in harmony with those of America. In addition to the present bootlegging we would have the newspaper bootlegging, the offense being spiritual in both cases.

I do not think that this will ever happen. The Foreign Language Press of America has served a great and useful purpose, and will gradually pass away with diminishing immigration. The first generation immigrants who read it will pass away too, and the second generation will take no interest in anything but in this bubbling and active American life, which will be their own life. The problem of Americanization about which so much ink is being spilt, is being settled noiselessly and effectively in our public schools, and any talk about the disloyalty or the unassimilation of the foreign element of our population becomes idle when we only take into account that out of the entire German population of the United States there was only one who evaded his obligation at the time of the draft.

The Foreign Language Press of America will follow its natural path, and speaking for myself and my paper, I will confess this much, that it will be a happy day for me when the entire Atlantis will appear in the language of the Declaration of the Independence which is that of our adopted land, of which we are citizens not by chance but by choice.

BUILDING and HOLDING CIRCULATION

THE newspaper that needs more circulation needs us. Our plan has proved successful everywhere we have tried it. We can put the first newspaper in its field in an invulnerable position, or we can put the second or third newspaper in first place at an insignificant cost to its owners.

We serve only one newspaper in a territory, but we serve that one seriously and successfully.

If interested wire. Information without obligation will follow immediately.

Mirrors of Buffalo

THESE newspapers are the mirrors of Buffalo, reflecting faithfully the life and character of its sterling citizens and at the same time giving hundreds of thousands of readers a clear view of world events. Among many other things, Buffalo has a reason to be proud of her well-edited papers.

Most certainly it is a real pleasure for us to tell you that the publishers of these papers made it unanimous when it came to selecting a type metal—they chose Imperial Metal.

No mere co-incidence can account for ALL SIX Buffalo newspapers selecting the Imperial Metal Plan. There was a reason. That same reason was also in the minds of publishers of other leading Metropolitan newspapers. It decided the small city, town and village publisher that it was what they needed.

Here's the Reason!

The Imperial Plan showed them how to avoid costly metal troubles and add years of service to their metal. In addition they found it economical and dependable. Let us send you the same Plan that these Buffalo papers use, showing you how it can be adapted to your shop.

JAPANESE AGAIN SEEK RADIO ENTRY INTO CHINESE COMMUNICATIONS

State Department Watching Protest of Tokyo Against Erection by Federal Telegraph of an American-Owned Station and Claim of Prior Rights

By SAM BELL
(Washington Correspondent, EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

RENEWAL of the Japanese protest to China of the contract of the Federal Telegraph Company for erection and operation of radio stations in Peking and Shanghai has been responsible for a revived interest in the communications situation in the Far East. The Federal wireless, an American concern, is building stations in China despite the Japanese claim that the Mitsui Company has a monopoly granted by China to the radio development of that country. The situation has been the occasion for several exchanges between the American legation and the Peking foreign office on one hand and the Japanese legation in China and the Peking Government.

Recently Japan renewed the protest and again set up the Mitsui claims in the face of the Washington Arms Conference agreement, the American open door contention and refusal to recognize the validity of the Mitsui arrangement, made when the notorious Anfu Government was in power in Peking.

Although the American State Department has taken no official cognizance of the newest Japanese move, every development is being watched. The United States, when the time comes, will reiterate its position, which is that the Federal wireless contract is valid and the United States proposes that the American company receive consideration from China.

The great reasons for American insistence in the situation, in addition to Secretary Hughes' determination to maintain the "open door," is the need of increased communication facilities in and out of China at rates which will be workable for commercial and press messages.

Briefly the history of the controversy is as follows:

Early in 1921, just previous to the calling of the Washington Arms Conference, the Ministry of Communications in Peking signed a contract with the Federal Telegraph Company for the construction of several high-powered radio stations to be owned and operated by the Chinese Government. The Japanese protested and tried to force China to cancel the contract. Secretary Hughes made inquiry of the Japanese and then the Japanese foreign office produced a secret contract which gave them a 30-year monopoly over all wireless construction and development both within China and between China and other nations.

This led to an exchange of communication between Secretary Hughes and Dr. Sze, Chinese Minister at Washington, on the subject of the open door, and provided the legal basis for some of the understandings that later developed at the Washington Conference. The question appeared to be settled when Japan signed the Nine Power Treaty, which included almost word for word the exchange of notes between America and China on the open door policy.

But it didn't settle the matter, for Japan subsequently threatened China with dire consequences if the Federal wireless contract was carried out. Nevertheless work on the stations of the Federal company went forward and the Japanese protests continued.

Finally it leaked out that the station erected in Peking by the Mitsui company was unworkable and the Japanese were attempting to persuade the Radio Corporation of New York and the British Marconi Company to enter into an undertaking with the Mitsui Company by which the station would be internationalized. This plan failed, leaving the Japanese to resume their protests.

The validity of the Mitsui contract has been repeatedly attacked on the ground that it was granted by the Chinese Minister of Navy under the old Anfu regime in 1918 and the Minister of the Navy was without authority to bind the Chinese Government by the granting of such a contract.

All efforts on the part of Japan to internationalize the radio development of China at the Washington Conference failed because of the protests of China and Japan's action in eventually agreeing to the Nine Power Treaty, which guaranteed to China certain rights that obviously belonged to her, indicated that the alleged monopoly of the Mitsui Company had been abandoned. Chinese officials have taken the Japanese communications, directed at Peking since that date, as an effort to undermine and neutralize the constructive accomplishments with respect to China, made at the Washington Conference.

A. A. C. W. DELEGATION LEAVES FOR PARIS

Party of 500 Off for French Capital Friday—Will Visit Battlefields —Trip Terminates Next Thursday

Paris was the Mecca this week of the American delegates to the A. A. C. W. convention at Wembley, following the final adjournment of the business sessions of the convention on Thursday last week. A party of 500 left London for the French capital Friday, July 25, where a gala reception by French officials and business men was in readiness.

The Paris trip will terminate Thursday, July 31, following a round of entertainment and tours to the battlefields of the World War.

The first event scheduled for the American visitors was a national reception upon their arrival in Paris, while other features included visits to Versailles and Fontainbleau, and a ceremony at the tomb of the Unknown Soldier in Paris. Hotel accammodations for the delegation were arranged for by the Paris Reception Committee.

The Paris trip followed a week of sightseeing tours in England, Scotland and Ireland arranged by British convention authorities. The first tour began last Saturday, following the close of the Wembley entertainment program, and carried a group of 250 delegates from London to Brighton, where motor drives were taken to nearby historical points.

Tours to Edinburggh, Glasgow, Belfast and Dublin drew large numbers of the American contingent. Other sightseeing trips led to Yorkshire, Northampton, Southwest England and the Midlands. Each covered a period of several days. Elaborate entertainments were provided by local committees at all points. Transportation was free.

At Edinburgh, on Wednesday, a number of delegates played golf on the famous St. Andrews links as guests of the Royal and Ancient Club of St. Andrew.

All of the tours were so arranged that delegates were able to be back in London in time to leave for Paris Friday if they wished. Following the termination of the Paris visit next Thursday the majority of the touring delegates will sail for home.

A. A. C. W. APPROVED CODE OF NEWSPAPER MEN

THE A. A. C. W. Convention in its final session July 17 received and approved the Code of Ethics adopted recently by the Association of Newspaper Advertising Executives at Columbus, Ohio. In the course of this Code of Ethics, these leading American newspapser declared:

"Since Truth-in-Advertising has been recognized from the beginning as an essential in honest merchandising, every co-operation should be continued to the end that no advertisement be accepted for publication if it is misleading, fraudulent or harmful.

"Complete co-operation with all other departments of the National Advertising Commission of the A. A. C. of W. should continue in order that organized advertising may have greater power to prevent and control abuses which tend to bring the whole or any part thereof into disrepute.

"We believe that every newspaper may be a successful and economical advertising medium when properly used. Complete co-operation should exist between all newspaper advertising departments and references to competing newspaper, when necessary, should be truthful statements subject to verification from reliable sources. Derogatory references regarding the personnel, policies or advertising value of contemporary newspapers, should be avoided to the end that all forms of destructive and unfair competition may be eliminated and the standards of newspaper advertising constantly raised higher.

"The advertising agency is an established institution which has assisted in the development of advertising, and should be supported because of its service to business. Commissions to advertising agencies should be allowed on national advertising when recommended by properly constituted authority, and if in accordance with established policy of the newspaper, but the recognition of the agency should be restricted to the organizations functioning as bonafide agencies capable of rendering complete and adequate advertising service.

"Business is honorable and advertising, its voice, needs no apology. No advertisement should be published in the guise of news or editorial matter and all advertising should be clearly designated as such by borders, type or similar device.

"Matter designated as news which comes to the Advertising Department should be referred to the Editorial Department for use or rejection by that department on the basis of its news value."

86 COVER CHICAGO TRIAL

Special Wires in Court Room as Leopold-Loeb Case Opens

Eighty-six newspaper men and women were present in Judge Caverly's court, Chicago, Monday at the opening of the hearing of Nathan Leopold and Richard Loeb, confessed murderers of young Robert Franks.

Admission was by ticket only. Seventy-two press tickets were issued to Chicago newspapers and press associations; 14 to out-of-town writers.

Special direct wires were installed in the court room, immediately adjacent to the judge's bench and the witness stand. for the Associated Press, United Press and International News Service, and for the leading Chicago daily papers. The operators were equipped with silent senders.

Reporters were permitted to use "noiseless" typewriters at the specially provided tables and in the jury box.

In addition to the provision for the press in the court room, a special room was fixed up, adjoining Judge Caverly's court, where tables and additional telegraph wires were installed. Bailiffs were assigned to keep those not carrying press tickets out of the newspaper section.

Flashlight pictures are barred during the sessions of the trial, but can be taken during recesses, Judge Caverly ruled.

THE GRAPHIC ARTS AND THEIR RELATION TO MODERN NEWSPAPERS

Advertisers Are Only Beginning to Learn the Possibilities of Artistic Illustration in Daily Press—First Page Best in a Publication, and Copyreader the Best Ad Copywriter

By F. H. McMAHON

A BULLETIN of the Advertising Buerau of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association says: 'A newspaper has an almost spiritual duty to perform. It must get out on time. It must achieve in its brief daily life a genuine miracle—and a miracle of mechanical achievement—that might well seem impossible. You can't retard the rapid progress of sizzling news because an advertiser wants a beautiful advertisement."

That one paragraph alone conveys to the thoughtful advertiser and all others connected with advertising the relations of the graphic arts to newspapers. The element of speed, so vital to the success of the metropolitan daily newspaper has itself placed a limitation upon the use to which the advertiser can put the space he buys in that paper, although those limitations have not been arbitrarily set by the publishers but by the advertisers themselves.

The speed with which "sizzling news" is prepared and issued to a public waiting to know what is going on in the world, establishes certain requirements which must be met by all advertisers using the newspapers. Certain kinds of paper must be used, it must be of a sort that will readily absorb ink with which it is printed and assure a clean-looking publication; the ink that is used must have the right constituents to produce effective and satisfactory results at a speed that checks off thousands of copies in the brief space of a few minutes.

Naturally, the finished product, the newspaper as it is issued each day, cannot compare in appearance with the monthly or even weekly publications which take weeks in preparation and equally as long in the printing. Time and the materials used preclude any such possibility.

It is also a fact that the limitations that advertisers have put on the use that can be made of newspaper space are based on precedents established in the days when newspaper equipment was far below the standard of today, when the facilities for preparing copy for the newspapers were sadly inadequate and in no way comparable with present-day methods.

Advertisers in the old days were victims of habits of thought. Because one method had been tried out in the newspapers and found to be a failure, it naturally followed that this same method was not subject to adaptation to newspaper requirements in some other form which would be successful. On the other hand, certain methods had been found successful in newspaper work and as a result any dozen pieces of newspaper copy prepared by the same advertising man appeared to have been cut off the same bolt as far as similarity of treatment was concerned.

The advertiser of yesterday figured out newspaper possibilities this way: "Don't use anything but outlines. Close lines, if they print at all will appear as blurs." "Go light on the blacks, they usually turn out as grays and poor ones at that." "Half-tones are bunk, they fill up and smear after the first few thousands have been printed. Maybe a few newspapers can use them satisfactorily, but most of them can't—so lay off of them!" And so on, listing an infinite number of don'ts and but very few do's.

Even so, today finds relatively few advertisers using the newspapers who are making the best use of the space that is bought. Time and money are spent in market research to find out where to sell the goods to be advertised; high salaries are paid to big men of the advertising profession to dig up the facts concerning the goods and the people who will buy them; equally high salaries are paid men to discover the point of contact with the consumer and put it into type; but few advertisers are spending much if any time endeavoring to find out what the limitations on the treatment of newspaper space really are.

No more interesting study can be indulged in than that of typography. If one word can be used in a comprehensive manner to explain the best method to follow in arriving at a piece of typography, it is the word simplicity. Study of the typographical work of such acknowledged authorities as John Henry Nash of San Francisco and Bruce Rogers of New York will prove a revelation to the advertiser. These two artists in type follow the simplest methods. You will find that neither uses more than one family of type in an advertisement. They stick as closely as possible to one size, but where display is required, use a larger face, but always of the same family.

The printing office which endeavors to show its versatility by introducing a great variety of types in any one composition entirely misses the mark and destroys the symmetry and balance of the composition. The advertiser—especially in newspapers—should remember simplicity—one family of type, and few sizes.

A composition shot full of white is displeasing to the eye, distracting to the vision and makes the negative rather than the positive impression you desire. The type should be blocked, built solid; there should be fewer open spaces between paragraphs—all the white space possible should be gained in the layout, through block composition on either side of the type. For newspaper advertising the advertiser should avoid the use of type too small and type with hair-line descenders and ascenders. If type is too black-face, it is offensive—if it is too light-face, it easily breaks down in the reproduction process.

An advertisement sent to a metropolitan newspaper is first reproduced in matrix form and then cast in soft metal, and both these processes carried on at tremendous speed. Under these circumstances, what happens to fine-line types or the delicate italics, introduced with so much care? They are broken down, and when printed at the rate of 30,000 an hour, prove a disappointment to the advertiser, and the audience addressed is unable to read them.

But newspaper advertising is not entirely a matter of type and copy, that is to say, editorial content of the advertisement. To quote a Strathmore advertisement, "Paper is part of the picture." Whether the picture is produced in half tone, or some other process, whether the paper be the finest of super-coated stock or plain newsprint, paper always plays as important a part in the finished reproduction as do any of the other mechanical elements that enter into the subject.

Pancoast, perhaps the highest paid mechanical director in the newspaper field, in advising MacManus on the handling of Maggie and Jiggs, said, "Don't forget, you have one of the greatest colors in the world to work with—white." And because the cartoonist makes liberal use of white space, cartoons have come to be a regular part of the diet of the newspaper readers. They have proved that a few lines, properly placed in their relation to the white space, can be made to mean much or little.

This then brings us to a consideration of the embellishments of the space that the advertiser buys in newspapers, and again to quote the Advertising Bureau of the A. N. P. A.: "There is now practically no ban in the newspaper field against any of the techniques of advertising art. Careful study of correct methods of preparation has solved the problem."

Consider for a moment. When Phoenix Hosiery advertising first appeared in the national mediums, embellished by beautiful borders, few paused to realize that a new treatment had been developed that was equally as adaptable to newsprint as to coated stock. But today Phoenix advertisements are appearing in many newspapers and the effect is no less pronounced on the white space of newspapers as it is on the highly calendared stock of Good Housekeeping.

Hart, Schaffner & Marx, crayon drawings, with Ben Day background and high lights hand-tooled out, constitute another treatment of newspaper space which a few years ago would have been thought impossible, and yet today the hundred thousandth imprint of this copy on newsprint stock is as clear and effective as the first.

Before the newspapers can really play their true part in the graphic arts as far as advertising is concerned, the advertiser must learn the proper use of white space. He must study the various possible forms of treatment, spend a little money, if necessary, to try out various ideas, get acquainted with newspaper makers, and learn what really can and cannot be done. Too many advertisers know what can't be done, and not enough know what can be done with newspaper space.

Of many treatments that have been proved suitable for newspaper work in the past two years, each is so entirely individual as to preclude possibility of successful imitation by other advertisers. The enlarged coarse screen half-tone used by Goodrich Tires attracted considerable attention and was used very effectively, especially in heading pieces for the purpose of gaining readers' attention. Flat Ben Days, laid over line drawings, are gaining favor, and when used to illustrate garments on figures enable the advertiser to bring out the general lines of several garments—each in an individual way. Ben Day on shadow backgrounds has been used with great success, where a secondary message almost as important as the primary message is to be conveyed.

The quarter-tone, too, has proven a real success in newspaper advertising. For the quarter-tone, make a coarse screen half-tone of the photograph, or wash-drawing make a proof of it on Rossboard—give this proof to the artist, who will scrape off the chalk where he wants the picture to show white, and black it where he wants the picture to show black; then make a line engraving and you have the quarter-tone. The purpose in making the line engraving is so there will be no dots over the white spaces, and so the blacks the artist wanted will print black. This is an effective method, but little in use.

It is not generally known, but some of the largest national advertisers are using quarter-tones for newspaper work to great advantage. Probably the most attractive development is in the use of the imitation wood cut—a technique that lends itself to various forms of use, but which never tires. A number of accounts that have appeared recently have used this particular form of illustration very successfully, although not to such an extent as to pall upon the readers.

However, summing it all up, the outstanding characteristic of newspaper art work today is its refinement and beauty. Though this much-desired condition has been reached by gradual steps, it has at last arrived and bids fair to stay with us.

Many newspaper advertisements of today are fit for the finest of magazines; they look like magazine pages, and yet have been so shrewdly handled as to composition and treatment that they print wonderfully well on newsprint despite the popular conception on the limitations of rapid newspaper printing.

The manufacturer has cared only that his advertising printed well and delivered the message; treatment and technique were secondary with him if given any consideration at all. Artists and advertising men, however, are coming more and more to realize that the limits of effective use of newspaper space have not yet been reached, and are making every effort to devise and perfect new and better ways of using it.

Newspapers from an advertising standpoint will never take their just position among the graphic arts until the advertisers themselves learn the proper and best uses of the space they buy.

MAGEE AGAIN IN JAIL FOR CONTEMPT

Legal Battle On as Sheriff Refuses to Honor Governor's Pardon of Albuquerque Editor—Goes to Supreme Court

Refusal of Sheriff Delgade of Las Vegas, N. M., to honor a pardon from Gov. J. F. Hinkle releasing Carl C. Magee, editor of the Albuquerque New Mexico State Tribune from jail, precipitated a legal tangle involving the State Supreme Court, which was in process of being unravelled as EDITOR & PUBLISER went to press this week.

Magee was committed to jail Tuesday after he had been called before Judge David J. Leahy at Las Vegas, to answer contempt charges resulting from editorials printed last summer flaying alleged corruption in the courts of the state. When called before the judge, Magee said he had nothing to say "only that I deny that I am being accorded due process of law and that I deny that this is a court."

Judge Leahy then adjudged him in direct contempt and sentenced him to from 3 to 6 months in the San Miguel county jail.

At the same time he was adjudged in contempt of court on charges preferred a year ago as the result of remarks and editorial utterances made by him during the course of his trial for criminal libel before Judge Leahy. He was sentenced to 3 to 6 months in jail on each of two counts, the sentences to run concurrently.

Gov. Hinkle immediately signed a pardon which was taken to the Las Vegas jail by Adj. Gen. Skipwith on Wednesday. The sheriff refused to honor it claiming the Governor had no authority in a contempt case. Friends of Magee crowded about the jail and the situation became tense. Adj. Gen. Skipworth is reported to have asked the Governor for authority to call out the state militia to effect Magee's release.

Later Sheriff Delgade declared he would release Magee providing erroneous case numbers on the pardon were corrected, and informed the Governor by telephone he was not contesting his power of pardon for direct contempt.

In the meantime Magee's attorneys obtained a writ of habeus corpus from the State bench. The sheriff late Wednesday was formally notified of the issuance of the writ and announced he would start immediately for Santa Fe, the State capital, with his prisoner, where the case would be threshed out before the State Supreme Court.

Surrounded in his cell by every comfort that could be supplied him by his sympathizers, Magee remained in high spirits and expressed himself as being confident of the outcome of the hearing before the higher court.

He reiterated his intention of continuing his fight to drive from office District Judge Davis J. Leahy, before whom he has been tried and convicted twice within the last year. Magee declared he would continue his course as mapped out in a statement appearing in his newspaper, the New Mexico State Tribune, Wednesday, in which he further attacked Judge Leahy and announced his determination to see the fight through.

The statement, which appeared as a communication to the Judge, declared that Magee did not consider his tribunal a properly constituted court and that he appeared only because Judge Leahy invoked the law of the State to compel his appearance.

Selling Churches Advertising

It can be done—but it's dreadfully hard work unless the churches have been in the habit of investing money this way. There are many clergymen and church officers who believe that no money should be spent by churches except for absolute necessities. Only after long persuasion by advertising solicitors will they see the advantages of investing money in advertising.

Many newspapers have found it profitable to sell a page to a group of merchants and professional men on behalf of all the churches in town. The names of all the churches are printed, and at the top a general invitation to worship somewhere, similar to copy offered by the Church Advertising Department of the A. A. C. of W.

EVERY NEWSPAPER SHOULD HAVE WELL KEPT MORGUE, MAUGHAN DECLARES

Begun on Small Scale, It Can Be Developed to Invaluable Department—Cubs Should Start Filing to Get Broad View of Daily

By CHARLES B. MAUGHAM

Librarian, St. Louis Post-Dispatch

IN considering the question of a newspaper library, reference and information department, or morgue, it must be borne in mind that the plans are necessarily laid out on a scale commensurate with the size and scope of the paper and with due consideration for the resources available for the purpose.

The department is literally the office store of information and it necessarily covers every factor that goes into the paper. However, a one man morgue can be made as useful to a paper that does not want to go more extensively into the work, as a much more elaborate organization on a larger paper with unlimited resources at its disposal. It is merely a matter of adapting your system of work to your facilities. There are any number of morgues scattered throughout the newspaper offices of the country that do not even receive the undivided attention of one man and there are other fairly organized and efficient departments of the same character that are employing as many as 30 people in the work.

Perhaps we can strike a happy medium between the two extremes by taking as an example the system of work now being followed by the St. Louis Post-Dispatch where a staff of 9 is employed. All of them work primarily on the index of the paper each day and in addition each is assigned to a special division of the work with full responsibility for that division.

The work involves making a daily lesson of the paper and recording all the elements in such a way that a ready reference may be had to them at any time in the future. This work has been systematized in such a way that a novice soon becomes familiar with the routine and while it is not possible to entirely eliminate the human hazard, it is found that news matter easily adapts itself to systematic indexing and such a plan has been worked out.

News for the most part is simply the by-product of human activities, personal, social, political, industrial and takes in much of the animal kingdom, a great deal of the natural phenomena and wanders at times into the totally uncharted realms. The index system follows this general course of personal and subject headings, geographical classifications and official designations. The student must understand his local municipal government, his county government, his state government and the general system of government throughout the country and the nations of the world. He must know the legislative procedure and congressional practice as well as the usages and practices of the parliaments, assemblies and legislative bodies of the other countries. He should be fairly familiar with his geography, not only local but state and nation wide and should have such a running touch with the outlines of the world that he can readily visualize the route of such an epochal event as the flight of the American army aviators around the world to the west and the course of their arrivals, the English, French and Portuguese to the east. He may be called upon at any moment to locate the position of these men. In general information, the newspaper librarian should have a knowledge of French, English, German, Spanish and Italian with a background of Greek and Latin as they are called for in the course of a day's work. If he has any spare time to acquire any of the other 3,000-odd tongues that are spoken in the world, 1,600 of which are said to be made use of in the United States, he will probably find that they will come in useful at times.

He should have a general knowledge of world history and a particular knowledge of the men and events of his own period. In fact if there is any place where wider range of knowldge is called for than in a newspaper library it has not been revealed in my experience.

If I were directing the affairs of a newspaper office and had an efficient reference department I would place all students who sought positions in the office, in the morgue primarily in order to get them in touch with the whole scheme of things. If a student goes into one of the departments, he necessarily becomes lopsided either on local news, telegraph news, sport news, financial news or in relation to advertising or circulation questions. In morgue work he comes in touch on an equal basis with all the news departments of the paper as well as the other divisions. It broadens his view and enlarges his knowledge to a point of taking in the whole works so that he becomes familiar with every element that goes into the paper.

The library of a newspaper office is necessarily governed by circumstances similar to those stated at the beginning of this paper. I am familiar with newspaper libraries carrying as high as 10,000 volumes. Such a collection in an office, or course, is an invaluable thing but it is not by any means necessary. A small collection of standard reference works will satisfy the ordinary demands. These should include the Bible and concordance, Shakespeare works, dictionaries of all languages, atlases, gazetteers, almanacs, year books, Who's Who, the congressional directory, the year books of the various states, the official publications of foreign governments, Burke's Peerage, Almanach de Gotha, and the list can be added to indefinitely. I have in mind particularly biographies, autobiographies, histories and books of an informative character—no fiction.

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch reference department at the present time is carrying in about 100 filing cabinets, nearly 3,000,000 clippings and pamphlets, in the neighborhood of half a million photographs and almost 5,000 cuts. A recent survey of the office to arrive at the valuation brought out the fact that the department contained material that could not be reproduced for several hundred thousand dollars. It was beyond estimable value for when it came to figuring the reproduction cost of the collection investigators found that it could not be entirely reproduced at any cost, in other words, the material assembled over the period of years involved was not obtainable from any other source.

The department is considered an invaluable asset to the office and saves many times its cost each year by having available for immediate use material that would otherwise have to be got anew. In addition to being a bureau of information to the office the department also acts in a similar capacity to the general public. Its Answers to Queries section gives service to about 25,000 persons each year.

In the course of a day's work the department files on an average of 300 pieces of reading matter, 50 photographs and a half a dozen cuts. The calls for material in hand averages 200 pieces of reading matter daily, a dozen photographs and a half a dozen cuts.

F. P. A. HAS HIS DOUBTS

In Altamonte Springs, Fla., there is to be a national home for old newspaper men. The story says that it is to be for aged newspaper men and working newspaper men who care to spend part of their time with associates. But that, it strikes us, is a poor way to frivol away one's sinking years. It would be a good deal of a bore to sit on the porch of the home listening to some tiresome old bird telling you what a devil of a fellow he was on the Bazoo's copy desk, when you are waiting for a chance to tell him the really fascinating story of how you covered the Blinkum murder.

And ringing out on the balmy Florida air near the home, the most recurrent sentence probably will be, "So I said to him, 'You can have your old job. I'm through.'"—F. P. A. in the Conning Tower, New York World.

DISPLAY SPACE URGED

Social Agencies of Several Cities Have Found It Profitable

Use of display advertising was suggested at several meetings of the publicity representatives of social agencies at the recent meeting of the National Conference of Social Work in Toronto. Some display space has been used in Fort Wayne, Ind., by social agencies there, following an offer by local department stores to finance page space for that means.

Other cities have used paid space in connection with the annual drive for funds for the community chest. Minneapolis has an item for $5,000 in its budget for advertising this fall. Paid space has also been used in Cleveland. Report came during one conference of another city where half-pages were used with coupon and the cost of the advertising was received in donations in two days.

Prediction was made by one speaker that in five years social agencies would be using paid newspaper space in a large way to accomplish the same results now being sought by the national advertising of the need of fresh air work for city children being done by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company.

McKeesport daily likes first Ludlow so buys another

IN March, Mr. Jess E. Long, vice-president of The Daily News, McKeesport, Pa., wrote: "That we are well satisfied with the Ludlow is shown by our now making plans to install an additional one. When the Ludlow was put in this office we had grave doubts as to whether it would meet the requirements of our advertisers and to our own satisfaction. After three months we were well satisfied and really wondered why we had not installed the Ludlow long before.

"We doubt if any office was any more skeptical about the Ludlow than we were before and immediately after installing it."

Since writing the above lines, Mr. Long has installed a second Ludlow equipment in the composing room of The Daily News.

By WALTER BERNDT

Creator of "Smitty" for The Chicago Tribune Shys at Spelling

WALTER BERNDT, creator of "Smitty," Chicago Tribune syndicate feature, was born so recently that he won't say when. However, it is known that when Dewey said, "You may fire when you are ready, Gridley," it didn't reach Walter's ear for several years thereafter.

WALTER BERNDT

He says he couldn't spell very well at birth and denies that there has been much improvement since. Some cartoonists, however, are modest, even if they can't spell it.

At present Mr. Berndt struggles with the daily doings of "Smitty" at a desk on the second floor of the Daily News building, New York. The gentleman at the adjacent desk (whom he calls Mac) is sometimes helpful to him, as you may see from Mr. Berndt's own penciled remarks:

"I started my drawing career," he explains, "by scribbling pictures on the floor. My first step upward was drawing pictures on the wallpaper. Then I took a hop and landed on the Evening Journal, where I was office boy, sport carto—hey, Mac, are there two o's in cartoonist?—onist, cleaner-up, comic strip artist, or what have you. Not much money, but lots of expee—hey, Mac, how d'ya spell experience?—experience. Thanks very much, Mac!

"After the hop, I took the skip that took me on the Evening Telegram, and 'skip' was right.

"After the hop and skip, there must always be a jump—and jump I did, 'way out to the Chicago Tribune. But Ma was nice and said I could stay with her little boy, the Daily News, and so I came back to Brooklyn, where I was born, and feel more at home.

"So everything is lovely and I'm looking at the future without any missgiv—hey, Mac, how d'ya spell misgivings? * * * Gosh! Mac's gone home! This is where I gotta stop!"

INDIANA

IS AMONG THE FOREMOST STATES OF THE COUNTRY

IN CROPS AND STOCK RAISING

Indiana's first great wealth came from its farms, and agriculture still plays an important part in its trade life.

Indiana's agricultural value is great, very great. Her diversified crops never fail and provide steady incomes to her farmers. The crop value exceeds and her live stock products are worth

$497,000,000

$100,000,000

Indiana leads in agricultural valuation per square mile, on many items. The value of all farm property is $84,508 per square mile. Over three times the average value for the country.

This vast state is becoming more and more productive and more valuable. The density of population is increasing from year to year.

Indiana's buying power is growing rapidly. Indiana must be considered as an important factor, worthy of your attention and pretty certain to return results in any advertising campaign.

The daily newspapers listed here will carry your sales message to "all Indiana." Use them regularly.

WELLER HEADS IOWA'S JOURNALISM SCHOOL

University Editor Named Director After Reorganization — Lazell, Editor Rapids Republican, Joins Teaching Staff

Organization of a school of journalism at the University of Iowa, announced recently, has been completed, with Prof. C. H. Weller, university editor, as director. The school will absorb the courses and faculty of journalism which has heretofore functioned. Fred J. Lazell, editor of the Cedar Rapids (Ia.) Republican, has been added to the staff as a full time instructor.

Prof. C. H. Weller

Professor Weller has been editor of all the university's official publications for 18 years. Among his other duties he is chairman of the board of trustees of student publications, business manager of the journal of the Classical Association of the Middle West and South. He was president of the Iowa Advertising Association for two years. He is the official representative of the Daily Iowan, student newspaper, in the Associated Press. He is a member of Sigma Delta Chi, professional Journalistic fraterity.

Prof. F. J. Lazell

Nearly 30 years of Professor Lazell's newspaper career has been spent as reporter, night editor, telegraph editor, city editor, managing editor and editor of the Cedar Rapids Republican. He now resigns that position to be succeeded by Fred M. Lazell, his 23-year-old son who graduated this spring from the University of Iowa's courses in journalism. Previous to joining the Republican's staff the senior Lazell was a reporter for the old Des Moines Leader, later absorbed by the Register, and was telegraph editor for the Des Moines News. He is also a member of Sigma Delta Chi.

Fred M. Lazell

Professor William S. Maulsby, who has been in charge of the journalism courses in theh past, will continue to be a member of the faculty. He was formerly on the Springfield (Mass.) Republican, Christian Science Monitor and Des Moines Register. Other members of the faculty will be George Gallup, graduate editor of student publications; Loren D. Upton, graduate business manager of student publications, and Frank Hicks, university news editor and formerly of the Waterloo (Ia.) Evening Courier.

The Daily Iowan, which set the pace last year for college newspapers by leasing full Associated Press service, will continue to be the laboratory where student newspaper men and women may get practical experience as reporters, editors, business and circulation managers.

Courses in the new school will cover the elementary and advanced phases of reporting and editing, feature writing, editorial writing, law of the press, the ethics and history of journalism, the art of printing and engraving, display and classified advertising, newspaper circulation, newspaper makeup, proof reading and office management.

CORRESPONDENTS' APPETITES NEVER WANED AT GARDEN

NEWS writers at the Democratic National Convention in Madison Square Garden may have become bored as the proceedings dragged along, but their appetities never waned, records of the New York World and Baltimore Sun Newspaper Club in the basement of the Garden show. Three thousand sandwiches were consumed daily by the correspondents, in addition to huge quantities of soft drinks, cigars and cigarettes. Service was free.

Here is a list of the things daily consumed:

1500 smoked sausages, otherwise "hot dogs."
25 gallons of coffee.
40 cases of soft drinks.
25 gallons of ice cream.
20 cases of milk.
10 boxes of cigars.
12 cartons of cigarettes.

T. J. McCartney, the grand vizier of the Baltimore Sun organization, the man who will produce anything from a hard-boiled egg to an elephant on order, was at the door of the club every day and managed the commissary. William Johnson, suggestion editor of the New York World, was the host inside the club.

ST. LOUIS DAILY SUSPENDS

Receiver Appointed for Amerika Company, Publisher of American

St. Louis, July 19.—Eugene J. Sartorius, vice-president and attorney for the Amerika Publishing Company, publisher of the suspended St. Louis American, has been appointed receiver for the company by Federal Judge Faris, on recommendation of three creditors who filed an involuntary petition in bankruptcy against the concern. Authority was given the receiver to continue the company's job printing business and to resume publication of Die Amerika, German language daily. The American, defunct English edition, will not be revived.

Sartorius' bond as receiver will be $10,000. Bernard Greensfelder, attorney for the creditors, said an inventory, just completed of the Amerika company's property, shows assets of $150,000.

Die Amerika failed to appear Wednesday morning, July 9, for the first time in more than 50 years, when employes quit to force payment of salary.

WHAT THEY ARE SAYING

NO SUBSTITUTE FOR LOCAL PAPER

"THERE was a period during which the small-town newspaper seemed to be smothering under the increasing circulation of the city dailies. The city daily does not and cannot devote space to matters of immediate interest to the small town and the surrounding territory. We may say, therefore, that while in the great wall of news that confronts us from day to day the large stones and bricks will always be furnished by the city dailies, through the various news services that cover the entire world, the chinks and the cement will ever be furnished by the local, country paper's news from nearby, the intimate heart-throbs that come from the local business, social, civic and home activities."—J. F. Cunningham, President Wisconsin Agriculturist Company.

MAKING A PROMINENT CITIZEN

"A NUMBER of Baltimore newspaper men once tried an experiment to determine if prominent citizens are born or made. They picked out at random an obscure man who conducted a little saloon which he called a hotel. Every few days they attributed some wise saying to this man, interviewed him about local politics or the state of the Union, and kept his name constantly before the public. It wasn't long before he began to be asked to sit on speakers' platforms and to be honorary pall-bearer whenever a leading citizen died. In other words, he did become a prominent citizen. At the end of a year he was elected President, I think it was, of a national hotel men's association."—Fred C. Kelly in McNaught's Monthly.

REPORTERS "SALT OF THE EARTH"

"A CITY editor is only as good as his staff of reporters. For, when all is said and done the reporter is the salt of the newspaper earth. When a city editor reaches a point where he ignores this fact, where he feels himself superior to the 'covering of a story,' where he no longer feels a thrill when a big story breaks, his days of usefulness are nearly over. What kind of news does the public want? The answer is—simple, constructive news, stories that build up, not stories that tear down."—George A. Seel, City Editor, Galveston (Tex.) Tribune.

ADVERTISING WILL PAY IN DOLLARS

"TO the public utility industry in all of its branches, Advertising says: 'We offer you an agency that contains potentialities of usefulness in your business far beyond anything you have realized in your tentative employments of it. Adequate and intelligent use of the Power of Advertising will pay in dollars, as it pays the merchant and the manufacturer; and in addition to that it will bring a steadiness and stability to your public relations of which you have not dreamed.'"—B. J. Mullaney.

Oklahoma Dailies Sued

The Tulsa (Okla.) Tribune and the Oklahoma City (Okla.) Times are defendants in two $25,000 libel suits filed by T. T. Hill of Hominy Okla., proprietor of a string of general stores in northern Oklahoma. Basis of the suits is a story written by Miss Gertrude Bonnin of Washington, D. C., for the Indian Rights Association, and, Hill contends, reflecting on his conduct as guardian of an Osage Indian. Hill also swore to a criminal libel complaint against Miss Bonin.

N. Y. Publishing Firm Formed

Payson, formerly of New York Times staff, have formed a new publishing firm at 385 Madison avenue, New York, but no statement is made as to what will be published by them.

H. J. Haarmeyer was editor.

It is authorized to have a capital of $30,000 and to publish and circulate a weekly newspaper and to sell advertising space. Incorporators are: John P. Richard, William J. Boll, Frank J. Tyrrell and Robert E. Faherty.

Championship Still in Doubt

The Brooklyn Press Club defeated the New York Newspaper Club at baseball on Ebbets Field, July 20, by a score of 5 to 3. It was the third game of the five-game series between the two teams to decide the newspaper championship of New York City. Each team has won a game. One game was a tie.

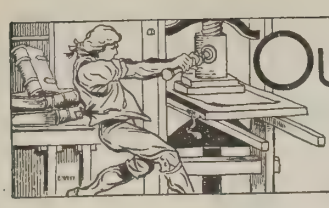
Offers advertisers unusual opportunities

There is no point in IOWA that is more than twelve miles from a railroad

In Iowa it is no problem to advertise to the rural communities, all of whom have money to spend.

Distribution is provided both for daily newspapers and commodities by more than 104,000 miles of public highways and 10,493 miles of steam and electric railroads.

A fifteen-minute automobile journey connects every farm house in Iowa with a railroad station. Iowa has 571,061 automobiles, enough to carry every person in the state outside in one trip.



The whole country side is assured daily newspapers and commodities. Advertise your goods in the daily newspapers so that the readers can order, by name, your merchandise.

The accompanying list of Iowa's leading daily newspapers will properly introduce your goods to the rural communities as well as to the towns and cities—the buying habits of these people are formed largely through their daily papers.

Our Own World of Letters

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

BOTH the front and the back office will doubtless read with interest the editorial in The Nation for July 23, entitled "Freedom Through Advertising." This editorial discusses the assertion of Edward A. Filene, the owner of a famous department store in Boston, that advertising is the world's best bet for the attainment of international peace.

Mr. Filene also believes that a revenue from advertising insures a free press, because advertisers want a circulation with buying power, and that no newspaper which does not prove itself to be free can long hold any number of such readers.

The editors of The Nation frankly admit that Mr. Filene is right in much that he says, but conclude the editorial in question with the following paragraph:

> We accept advertising as the basis of modern journalism, not as a boon, but as a necessary—and perhaps temporary—evil. We see hope in the signs that as the world plunges into an era of mass production, mass selling, and mass opinion, there are arising sizable groups to realize both the need and the opportunity of supporting journals whose clear, free, and individual note, like the "still, small voice, transcends the wind and the earthquake."

T. H. BAILEY WHIPPLE, literary critic of the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company of Pittsburgh, has compiled a volume, "Principles of Business Writing," which might well be put on the shelves of the newspaper library for the use of the copy desk. That part which deals with the principles of business letter writing contains valuable suggestions for those in the advertising and circulation departments. The part devoted to words and phrases often misused could be read to advantage by all who turn in copy. To avoid carelessness in the use of words and phrases most of us need to be reminded occasionally by men like Mr. Whipple.

FRIENDS and admirers of the late Frank I. Cobb will be interested to know that a limited edition of the book "Cobb of the World" has been published by E. P. Dutton & Co. This edition is printed for and by Mr. Cobb's friends; it is limited to 1,500 copies, which are numbered. The price of this special edition is $10 per copy and the proceeds from it will go to the "Frank Cobb Fund," which will be administered by the Exchange National Bank of New York for the benefit of his children.

I have already mentioned this book by way of a news notice, and I intend to review it more in detail in a later issue. This notice is simply to call attention to the special edition. Of course, there will be a regular and trade edition of the book published by Dutton & Co. and marketed through the usual channels. The price of this regular edition will probably be $3.50, but this trade and cheaper edition is something quite separate from the limited and numbered edition which I am now mentioning. Friends of Mr. Cobb wanted a fine piece of bookmaking and they have not been disappointed by E. P. Dutton & Co.

A BOOKLET entitled "Charles H. Grasty, 1863-1924" contains the various editorial tributes and biographical sketches published in the leading newspapers shortly after his death. Naturally it opens with the editorial from the New York Times, which is followed by the sketch of Mr. Grasty's career, published in the same paper at the same time—Jan. 20, 1924.

While Mr. Grasty at the time of his death was connected with the New York Times, he will probably be longest remembered for his connection with journalism in Baltimore, where for many years he was publisher of the Baltimore Sun. One of the finest tributes in the booklet is from his old friend, Fabian Franklin. It is entitled "An Old Friend's View" and was published in the Baltimore Sun, Jan. 20, 1924.

The article which has special interest for me is the one which appeared in Time, the news weekly, and which is entitled "A Publisher Who Preferred to Be a Reporter." Grasty was a great reporter, as well as an able newspaper publisher. One quotation from his interview with General Foch during the dangerous German drive of 1918 will prove beyond the permissibility of a doubt that he had that wonderful eye for those things which give interest to a news story:

> General Foch, before answering, took a few whiffs from his 2 cent cigar and looked at me with a smile of quiet confidence in his bright brown eyes. "They won't break through," he said, and the words were as percussive as pistol shots.

The booklet concludes with resolutions adopted by the Associated Press and the Publishers' Association, of New York City.

This article is said to be a study of the effect upon American journalism, and incidentally upon American public opinion, of the consolidation of many newspapers into a few controlled by an increasingly smaller group of proprietors. American periodicals of late have had a good deal to say on this subject, but not any more than can be found in British periodicals where the same condition obtains.

FOR those who sit at desks in the business office "Newspaper Accounting" by W. B. Swindell (The Ronald Press) will be found a handy volume to have in the drawer when called upon to make audits, investigations, or reports concerning newspaper properties. The author, who incidentally is secretary-treasurer of the Piedmont Company, has followed the instructions of city editors, "Boil it down."

There is no volume now on the market that contains so much valuable material dealing with the principles of accounting and cost finding as this book. Special mention should be made of the methods to be followed in checking and charging advertising and of the plans suggested for keeping track of departmental expenses.

Publishers of country weeklies and provincial dailies need just such information as will be found in this volume. Cost accounting is just as necessary for the newspaper plant as for any other industrial organization. Many newspapers have failed, not because of poor work of editors or reporters, but because of bad business management.

LURE OF THE TABLOID

cess of a tabloid than an arm-chair in the Union League Club is necessary for the success of the Times.

"Fifty years ago, newspaper editors did not print informative head-lines. Readers had to wade through a column or more to find out what a story was about. Gradually editors began to realize the age of hustle by printing headlines that told most of the story. The first informative headline writer was a short of tabloid Christopher Columbus preparing the way for newspapers such as the News that can give their readers all the news of the day in such form that it can be assimilated hurriedly, without causing mental indigestion.

Harold D. Jacobs, editor of the Baltimore Post, does not give pictures the premier place assigned by Payne. He has high hopes for tabloid journalism, which he sees as universal in the future. Like Payne, he views over-written news as one of the evil genii of modern journalism and he stresses the need for terse, natural language. Here are Mr. Jacobs' ideas:

"News told briefly, but interestingly, is infinitely more attractive, to Baltimore readers, at least, than pictures in general. However, in addition to news, we try to give out readers plenty of feature and news pictures. While tabloids like the metropolitan examples might succeed in smaller cities I don't believe they would be so successful as one stressing briefer news.

"Long train rides are absolutely not essential to large tabloid sales, in Baltimore, anyway, as the greater portion of our circulation is distributed to homes.

"Speaking only for the Post, I should say that full picture pages are limited in number by public preference. A real tabloid should never lose its identity regardless of the number of pages, if news and advertising is properly tabloided. Every inch in the paper should be interesting.

"Five columns seems to be the popular page-size here.

"The chief contribution of the Scripps-Howard tabloids, in my mind, has been the presentation of news in a natural manner and the elimination of artificial language—'written, but never spoken—known as journalese'.

"Our instructions to reporters and rewrite men is 'write just as though you were sitting down opposite your reader and telling him about it.' The result is stories shorn of superfluous words, hackneyed phrases and meaningless repetition.

"I believe economic conditions and the newsprint shortage will eventually force all newspapers to reduce size and I believe the Scripps-Howard tabloids are merely pioneering in the field the entire press will eventually have to enter."

John Gleissner, editor of the Washington Daily News, agrees in the main with Jacobs that pictures aren't all, when he says:

"There are two types of tabloid newspaper. One relies primarily on pictures, features and entertainment. The other attempts to be a complete newspaper in tabloid form, and while using pictures, does not make this the principal appeal.

"Pictures unquestionably carry a tremendous appeal. So also does news briefed to the bone.

"The tabloid should be able to succeed in cities of 200,000. Our experience leads to the belief that long train rides are not essential to sales, since a large tabloid home delivery can be established.

"A tabloid does not lose its identity through increased size, since the tabloid principle can be applied throughout. The five-column make-up is most popular, as this lends itself to standard equipment.

"The tabloid has shown, in my judgment, that the public likes tabloided news, and a convenient-sized paper. As for production, paper is saved, smaller bul makes delivery easier, newsboys can carr more copies for street sales, and adver tisements can be smaller because c greater visibility."

Mr. Vanderbilt, on his way to Londo for the A. A. C. W. convention, s fourth some of the ideas he has demor strated on the Coast:

"Both news and pictures are necessar to meet the variance of taste which w all have in us," he declared.

"I do not believe that a tabloid news paper can succeed in a city of less tha 200,000 population. The tabloid is for th masses and there are no real masses i cities of less than 200,000.

"Long train rides are not at all esse tial to the success of a tabloid. In Lo Angeles and San Francisco there are n subways. Furthermore, 77 per cent o our subscribers have their paper delivere home.

"Number of picture pages is limited b public preference. The cost is immateri in the end. The public wants so muc and no more. People need enough make them want it again. Too many pi tures would spoil this effect.

"In my opinion a tabloid newspap loses its identity as such by regular running a great number of pages. is not then a tabloid, it is merely an a breviated newspaper.

"Five columns is the best make-u Columns are too wide with only four the page, although this number is pr ferred, it seems, by the British and Can dian tabloids. We print six columns classified advertisements to a page.

"Tabloid journalism has contribut much to the making of newspapers. has taught elimination of waste and h brought a lessened production cost, easi distribution for route carriers, because the reduced size and weight of the pape and an increase in rates for advertisin It has demonstrated the need for special trained men in all positions, for bri news services, and for more news photo raphers. It is leading to the eliminati of practically all feature writers, and t training of a large number of new 'stu writers,' to freak, brief, chatty ne stories, the elimination of smut and di and the creation of a clean, interestin and aggressive newspaper that will en and remain in the home."

Editors of the Hearst tabloids in N York and Boston declined to comm on the questions.

A LOCAL druggist is advertising a unique sale. Prices are reduced as in the ordinary sale—usually from 10 to 15 per cent. In addition, this druggist gives free to every customer purchasing 50 cents' worth of goods a "Mystery Bag." This contains samples of nationally advertised goods and sundry products obtained free from the wholesale houses. The sale is advertised as "Manufacturer's Co-Operative Sale." Samples of as many as 25 items were in each bag, and the bags were gratefully appreciated by their customers.—Wayne Coy, Franklin (Ind.) Evening Star.

You can increase your real estate lineage by running once or twice a week a short article by a leading business man of your city on "Why I Own a Home." Articles should set forth advantages of owning a home and real estate in your city. This plan is being successfully used in many cities.—G. Smedal, Sioux City, Ia.

Many persons have been saving their reading period for their vacation. Why not obtain a group of ads from the booksellers and magazine dealers, featuring "Vacation Books," stories of sea, mountain, outdoors, guides, etc., and include not only light fiction and modern authors but more weighty books and classics which many persons put aside for that long period of uninterrupted rest which they believe they will have on their vacation.—C. M. Litteljohn, Washington, D. C.

"Own Your Bathing Suit," for your health and for the health of us all. Sporting goods houses, department stores and specialty shops would back a co-operative campaign on this subject, or at least one full page. No kick would come from resort managers, as locker charges are usually the same whether you use your own or bathhouse suit. Your copy service department could write rings around such a feature.—Ellis Loveless, Norfolk (Va.) Ledger-Dispatch.

Everybody, young and old, likes a puzzle, particularly if it's reasonably easy to solve. It gratifies their ego, and if there are prizes, there is the element of something for nothing. We ran a puzzle that netted 2 pages of advertising and brought more than 3,000 answers from every class of subscriber. The first page advertisement was of 14 puzzle verses. The names of automobiles were concealed in the verses. The second page contained the names of the cars, together with the verses and the winners of the contest. Every automobile dealer who joined the contest paid his proportionate share of the cost of the 2-page ads and was highly pleased with the result because of the interest created.—D. E. Cohn, Columbia (S. C.) Record.

Nearly all the best eating places have certain dishes on which they specialize. For instance, at one restaurant its Italian spaghetti will be particularly good. At another the tomato soup would be unusually excellent. And so on through all the various eating places. It would, therefore, be a splendid idea for the newspaper to get up a list of all the eating places which specialize in this way and to then run some copy urging people to try out all the dishes for which local restaurants are famous, and to then get these restaurants to use some special advertising for the event. A considerable amount of extra advertising could be secured in this way.—Frank H. Williams, Santa Ana, Cal.

Under the caption "Today's Notices," sell newsy and interesting readers to advertisers regarding sales, new styles, etc. Placed in the same position each day, this feature will attract increasing attention, and the rate per line may be double the ordinary "reader" rate because it is worth it.—H. H. Hudson, Cleveland Press.

Decorative designs of church spires and Gothic cathedrals may assist in selling your space to the churches, when used in conjunction with a display ad of "Ascension (or other church name) News," listing the entire Sunday program.—C. M. Litteljohn, Washington, D. C.

Daily or weekly sermonettes by local pastors make a feature for a small town or city paper which is to be commended. The Saugus (Mass.) Herald, a weekly, is handling such a feature in a unique way, using a boxed head, "The Wayside Chapel," and printing the short sermon double column.—Florence Tisdel, Muskogee, Okla.

We recently opened our columns to the members of the Boys' and Girls' Clubs in this county and let them tell in their own way their experiences in raising their pigs and baby beef. We offered medals for the best stories. The request for extra copies on the part of parents and the youthful writers proved that the idea proved popular among our country subscribers.—Donald O. Ross, Washington (Ia.) Democrat.

HOME FOR AGED NEWS MEN ASSURED

Florida Publishers Formally Accept Gift of Land and Money from Mr. and Mrs. C. D. Haines of Altamonte Springs, Fla.

ALTAMONTE SPRINGS, Fla., July 21.—First steps toward the founding of a national home for newspapermen, in connection with a school of journalism, were taken here last week, when 50 members of the Saturday Press Association assembled at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Charles D. Haines to receive their gift to the home and accept the charter and by-laws of the Florida Newspapermen's Home, Inc.

George Hosmer, president of the Florida Press Association, presided at the meeting, which was held in the Jasmine Theater, owned by Mrs. Haines, and part of the bequest to the newspapermen. After his address Mr. Hosmer called on Mr. Haines, who explained his motives in making the gift.

"From the time I was just a boy," he said, "I have had a great longing to be associated with men in journalism. Long ago I realized that I could not write in the manner that newspaper men write, and yet my attachment for the profession continued. Newspaper men have given much to the world and have received but small recompense. It has been my ambition to be instrumental in providing them with a real home where they can retire at the end of their long labors and enjoy themselves."

It is Mr. Haines purpose to try to raise a $15,000,000 endowment for the home, and he has already received some encouraging assurances of aid from wealthy men. His ambition for every state to have a building on the grounds with a large central auditorium. His gift includes two citrus groves of 20 acres each, another tract of 25 acres, the Jasmine Theater and the home place, of which he reserves possession for his wife and self until their deaths; a check for $10,000; $100,000 worth of stock in the Royal Fern Company, with the agreement that he will have for the remainder of his life the earnings of the stock above 6 per cent, and $50,000 worth of stock in the Florida-West Indies Corporation.

Following Mr. Haines' address, Major W. E. Barnett, pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Oakland, editor of the Winter Garden Herald, and a lifelong friend of Mr. Haines, paid a tribute to Mr. and Mrs. Haines. An ovation was given Mrs. Haines upon her appearance on the platform.

A humorous address by Rube Allyn and a talk by J. C. Brossier, of the Orlando Reporter Star, concluded the program. In the meantime the executive committee was in session and accepted the charter and by-laws of the Florida National Newspapermen's Home, Inc.

COVERING OLYMPICS TASK FOR GIANTS

U. S. Writers Sat Long Hours on Hard Benches—Track and Field, Polo, Swimming Events Widely Separated

By G. Langelaan

(Paris Correspondent, Editor & Publisher)

Paris, July 18.—Alan J. Gould, of the Associated Press; Henry Farrell, United Press; D. J. Walsh, International News; Grantland Rice, New York Herald-Tribune; J. E. (Ted) Meredith, Christy Walsh Syndicate; John Hallahan, Boston Globe; John Owens, Providence Journal, and Vincent Richards, Universal Service, will be through with the biggest Olympiad that has taken place so far by the time these lines reach New York. The plaudits of the crowd were not for them, but it is no exaggeration to say that their task has been greater than that of any athlete taking part. It proved a task for giants.

After the circus walk round and the pretty ceremony of taking the Olympic oath of the first day, the grim business began for the correspondents the next day, when their breaking in session consisted of a 7-hour stretch on the hard benches of the press stand. For 7 hours they had to strain every nerve, not merely to see who were the winners of the events, but note their positions during each race, and take notes for the leads which were to be written later. The second day's work brought them the close watching and reporting of no fewer than 17 heats of the 100 metres.

The sprints along the corridor leading from the press stand to the telegraph operators' desks were as exciting and keen as any taking place on the cinder-path. In these performances the lanky Frenchman Saguet employed by the Associated Press made history, rushing away with the copy just as soon as Gould or Topping, of the Paris office, and Angly, of the London office of the Associated Press, could hand it to him. The United Press was also there in force, with Webb Miller watching his team like a general looking over the field of battle.

One of the difficulties in reporting the Eighth Olympiad has been the large distances which have had to be covered. While field and track events were taking place at Colombes, 7 miles from Paris in one direction, polo was being played at St. Cloud, 4 miles from the capital in another direction. Swimming was at Les Tournelles, in the northeast of Paris, and correspondents home from Colombes after a hard day just had time to get a little refreshment and be off again to the Velodrome d'Hiver or to the Cirque de Paris for the wrestling, the fencing or the boxing.

Thomas T. Topping, of the Associated Press, waxed enthusiastic over the chances of his compatriots from overseas and was loudly offering to lay long odds in favor of an American athlete of his choice, seeking takers among his French press friends. An attendant came up and touched him on the arm and told him a gentleman wished to speak to him. Topping went over, and a spectator said, "I want to lay a hundred on the Swede."

He took Topping for a bookmaker.

HUNCHES

One Dollar Will Be Paid for Each "Hunch" published.

WHAT are the favorite flowers, plants or trees of your townsfolk? Prepare a questionnaire with spaces provided for annuals, perennials, conifers, deciduous trees, vines and deciduous shrubs. Then find out if alyssum or portalaca or some other plant is the favorite annual; if the elm is preferred to the maple; if clematis is the leading vine. Since practically every community has its flower lovers, this feature will surely prove interesting. A florist's catalogue will serve as a guide to the correct classification of plants or trees.—G. Harris Danzberger, Hartsdale, N. Y.

Newspapers usually do not call upon the bureaus of the news service they have serving them for enough individual stories out of the state capital or other nearby larger cities. Quite often editors learn a lead to a story at these points that is of particular interest to the people of the one community in which the paper is published but not of enough state interest to be sent through the regular channels of the news service. Ask your bureau men to secure the story for you. They will be glad to give their clients the extra individual service.—Lewis Hyman, Logansport (Ind.) Pharos-Tribune.

During the summer a reporter may interview florists and find out how flowers should be kept fresh. Many householders and home owners gather flowers from their gardens, and are unacquainted with the expert manner of keeping cut flowers alive. Other floral hints may be run from time to time. The interviewer may also ask about the most popular flower from time to time for weddings, parties and other local functions. These stories may be used with some historical background.—C. M. Litteljohn, Washington, D. C.

Get an interview with your city health commissioner and have him give a list of "Don'ts" for swimmers and beach visitors this summer. As for instance, "Don't go bathing immediately after a heavy meal," and "Don't change seats in a canoe or boat while in deep water; wait till you land." Such a list will be clipped and saved for reference.—G. Smedal, Sioux City, Ia.

The cry at the present time among realtors, home owners, and the effort on part of store owners is toward modernism in the home. On every occasion there is being featured the "model home," bungalow, or apartment. An interview with business men, modern young wife and mother of a large family is products of a good story.—L. J. Jellison, Dubuque (Ia.) Times Journal.

"Keeping up with M'Kinney; News Events of Today," says the standing boxed head used by the McKinney (Tex.) Courier-Gazette. Under this appear daily short news paragraphs about people and things, the first line of each being boldface. The column does not take the place of the usual personal mention column nor does it relegate to the inside without their own headlines too many local stories. This paper abounds in local stuff, having no pony service for telegraph news, and there seems to be plenty of local news to spare to make this column a source of constant surprise to readers.—Florence Tisdel, Muskogee, Okla.

What do your newsboys do with the money they earn and what are their ambitions? It would make an interesting story to do some investigation along this line and play up the boys who are saving money to go to college. In most cities such a story would be entirely new and as it would be jammed with human interest it would be sure to make a deep impression on the readers of your paper. —Frank H. Williams, Santa Ana, Cal.

What is the average size and cost of all the homes put up in your town during the past six months? Go over the building permits issued in this period for homes, get the average number of bedrooms in the homes, the average cost of the homes, etc., and then present this grand average of size and cost as being the ideal home for the city. This sort of a story would be of immense interest to many of your readers.—Frank H. Williams, Fort Wayne, Ind.

The Kansas City Star, under the late Col. Nelson, fostered good literary tastes among its readers by printing selections from the best authors. A similar project in our daily newspapers of today would cultivate a better reading taste and a return to the classics among others besides school teachers and their pupils. "Reprints from the Classics" appearing daily or Sunday with a thumb-nail portrait and biography of different authors, should prove popular.—R. C. Mowbray.

Features—When and As Wanted

SAN PEDRO, Cal., July 7, 1924.

TO EDITOR & PUBLISHER: The magazines seem to be alarmed over the number of newspaper consolidations and the increasing demand for "canned" features that are standardizing the newspapers of the country. Will Irwin has let the public in on a lot of tricks of the trade in this week's Collier's. "They don't know the half of it." Some of these writers who think the feature business has become so standardized that there will be no room for changes in the plan of things for the next 100 years or so ought to run a country daily close up to a metropolitan field and try to buy a few good features. For most of us "there ain't no such animal."

We are getting out from twelve to twenty pages daily with four Linotypes and a Ludlow. To cut down composition to a minimum we try to get all the good features we need in matrix form, both text and illustration. Outside of three comics we have just one feature that we feel measures up to our needs in quality and mechanical requirements. That is a boys' and girls' page once a week.

There is one good magazine page on the market that would fill our needs but it is put out by the owners of a chain group of metropolitan papers, one of which claims our territory. One of the New York papers offered us all its comics and magazine features at the attractive price of $10 a week and then withdrew the offer we had snapped up because another metropolitan paper claimed the territory.

I offered to bet the salesman for another New York metropolitan paper, who expressed his regret that he could not sell me his features in this territory, that he could get more money from the smaller papers in the territory than he could from one metropolitan paper. He agreed with me but said the boss did not agree with him. I wrote the manager of another New York syndicate and asked him to check up the number of papers using his features in the metropolitan field and compare it with the number of smaller papers that were not using them just to see if he could not find an opportunity. "I believe you have hit on a big idea," he replied, but that is the last I have heard from him.

We are printing an eight-column twelve-em paper, the Pacific Coast standard. Some of the features we would like to get in matrix form are furnished by one of the New York papers in 12½ em seven columns. I asked a traveling salesman why the management of his house persisted in saving at the spigot and letting opportunity run out at the bunghole. He saw the point and then wrote me from New York after he had finally secured an interview with his boss: "I know we have difficulties in the office in setting type on such a raft of stuff we use in the paper and to reset it again in twelve ems would add to the burden."

And so to save resetting it they don't sell it at all to me and hundreds of other country publishers who also have some burdens, believe me, in getting stuff set in our own offices. Will Irwin says that S. S. McClure nearly went broke trying to prove the theory of economics he evolved in buying a short story for one hundred dollars and selling it to twenty publishers for ten dollars apiece.

It is about time some wise gink carried the idea a little further and discovered what composition is costing the country publishers. What we want is somebody who can sell us a mat to go in our curved casting box and turn out a plate printing eight 12-em columns twenty inches long, that will not have to run the gauntlet of linotype operators, proof readers and make-up men who demand their wages every Saturday night. There is a great big wide world open to some enterprise feature man who can fill this demand for real good features among the smaller papers, along with a greater demand for midget feature mats for flat casting.

The Keystone State

In More Ways Than One
Pennsylvania
Has Proven Itself the Real Keystone State

This is especially true in regard to national advertising. Many somewhat weak and uncertain campaigns of advertising have been "held together" thanks to the good judgment of space buyers and advertising managers who have realized the wonderful opportunities for successful marketing in this territory.

The iron industry, the steel industry, the coal mines and the great farms of Pennsylvania have combined to make this state a "fountain of wealth" from which many campaigns have secured the necessary nourishment to carry them through trying periods.

Concentrating a carefully prepared campaign of advertising in the newspapers listed on this page has proven a "life saver" for many national advertisers.

Now is the time to carefully consider the wonderful markets, for every product from foods to motor cars, centered around each newspaper in this Pennsylvania list.

No fall campaign will be complete without this territory.

Newspaper advertising in Pennsylvania means placing your product before a receptive audience anxious for all that is best, regardless of price.

Tell It to SWEENEY! —especially the Young Folks

THERE may have been an era outside of Sunday school books when children were seen and not heard—much; when the adolescent male had to sprout whiskers and the female gather wrinkles before they became accredited members of society. But times, as the song writers remind us, have changed since father was a boy. Ever since the war the so-called younger generation has been on the cosmic consciousness and conscience. A girl now enters society at an age which previously entitled her only to give up dolls. Young men move faster and earn more in business than their fathers did. (How long have some of you hoary advertising men who read this been out of college?)

In consequence of these social changes, the young idea must be reckoned as an advertising target of first importance.

Consider the course of the Sweeneys, the average American family. Along about the time the wolf has been scared from the door and progeny are advancing in age, in grace perhaps, and in what is assumed to be an education, Mr. and Mrs. Sweeney have settled down. Mr. Sweeney enjoys a deserved feeling of accomplishment at having found some place in the world. He still has his ambitions, but in his heart he knows he will never be a world-beater. Other men may go farther, fare better, find more money, live in larger houses, make the front pages, smoke better cigars without inciting him to envy or inspiring him to effort. And Mrs. Sweeney has begun to admit that she is getting—well, a little stout; and has definitely abandoned any ambition of becoming a movie actress, a business woman, a perfect housekeeper or of knocking the Four Hundred for a goal. Mr. and Mrs. Sweeney are sedative with middle age. The starry heights, green pastures and far calls no longer move or molest them.

AT THIS point Nature gets in several good licks at replenishing the earth with new aspirations, dewy dreams, incandescent illusions and fresh assortments of the goods and chattels of this world—via the ignorant, ambitious and intense younger generation.

This new force is first felt at home. The Brussels carpet that still looks as good to Ma and Pa as the day it came from the mail order house, gives way to the juniors' propaganda for rug replacements. The mission furniture with the indomitable upholstery elegantly finished in imitation leather, is given the raspberry by the growing daughters; they drag Ma down to see something swell in mohair or brocatelle. And if the bankroll can possibly stand the strain the elders are gradually apprised of the fact that an automobile is an imperative essential.

While the Old Man still raises Cain with his tailor trying to get a fifty-dollar suit at the pre-war price, his sons overbid him on an outfit that includes plus fours. Ma will still snoop around the Bargain Basement while her married daughter takes over from a modiste a modest model at an immodest price. Many a girl whose mother haggled over the price of ham hocks can phone an order for petit pois, marrons glace, and antipasti without stuttering. The hard earned dollar of middle age moves nimbly as a nickel when youth starts to spend it. All this may be Bad News if you are the Old Man, but it must be good news if you are a business man because it means new markets.

TELL IT to Sweeney, the young Sweeneys, and make sales for today and tomorrow. Tell It first in New York where there are most young people, the most incomes, the most opportunities to make money, the most inducements to ambition, advancement and emulation.

Tell It first in THE NEWS, which not only has more readers than any other daily newspaper in America but probably more young readers (under thirty) than any other newspaper in the world. The circulation carries the message farthest and the tabloid page with its high visibility and attention value carries it quickest—and at lowest cost. Get the facts.

Magee's Own Story of "Contempt" Fight Which Put Him Behind Bars

New Mexico Editor Declares Proceeding a Travesty Upon Justice—Tried Through Interpreter to Spanish Speaking Jury in Distant County—Judge Called Him Vile Names—"I Deny This Is a Court," His Challenge

By CARL C. MAGEE

Publisher Albuquerque, New Mexico, State Tribune, a Scripps-Howard Newspaper

Written for and copyright 1924 by EDITOR & PUBLISHER

THIS story tells of an attack on the freedom of the press which cannot be duplicated in the legal history of the United States during the past 50 years. It is a story of the Fall-Bursum political methods which Fall tried to transport to Washington and failed in his effort.

Although I publish a paper in Bernalillo County and Judge Parker of the Supreme Court lives in Santa Fe County, I was indicted last summer in San Miguel County for libeling Parker. Parker stated on the witness stand that he did not request my prosecution. He stated many times that he did not believe the article complained of was libelous.

What I said was: "We suggest nothing to Judge Parker. He has grown too accustomed to old conditions to see anything wrong in what has happened." What had happened was that the clerk of Parker's court had committed a felony in the handling of public money. The prosecution was anonymous. No one assumed any responsibility for the indictment.

CARL C. MAGEE

San Miguel County is the keystone of the arch of the old Fall-Bursum machine. The county is presided over as political boss by a Spanish don. The people are 75 per cent unable to read or speak English. They are completely dominated by the boss. The judge of the District Court is his effective ally. The court is used as a political weapon. A half dozen times in the history of this county offending writers had been sentenced for libel. All were convicted within 48 hours after indictment. None went to the penitentiary. All ceased to write, as the alternative, which was all that was sought.

They pushed my trial at once. I could not find out how the Grand Jury or jury panels were secured. They would not give me even a couple of days to get my attorney there. I was tried through an interpreter to a Spanish speaking jury. I was sentenced to a year to 18 months in the penitentiary.

I rebelled and wrote articles exposing the travesty and attacking the judge. Each day I was cited for contempt. Four cases were tried. I alleged the truth of my statement that Leahy was corrupt. Leahy refused to vacate the bench or give me a change of venue or a jury. He decided he wasn't corrupt and sentenced me to a year in jail and imposed a $4,000 fine.

The Governor promptly pardoned me in all cases, alleging that the proceeding was "a blot on the state and a disgrace to the good people thereof." The contempt pardons were tested in the Supreme Court and held good. Judge Hanna, my attorney, was suspended from practice for defending me and the Supreme Court was asked to disbar him. Recently the Supreme Court reinstated him, having refused disbarment.

Last week a fifth contempt case which had been continued was called. This was one of the old cases. I said editorially that I had no more chance in Leahy's court than a lamb had with a butcher; that it was a slaughter house for justice. This drew another citation. I was tried on both.

Leahy announced that the truth of my statements was not a defense. My attorneys withdrew and I stood mute. When asked if I had any reason to give why I should not be sentenced I said:

"I deny that I am accorded due process of law. I deny that this is a court."

For this I was instantly sentenced for 90 days for a direct contempt. I was in jail within five minutes.

This answer was privileged. I was asked and had a right to state my position. But I went to jail just the same.

Last Thursday after two days in jail I was released on bail pending decision of a habeas corpus by the Supreme Court. That action was based on a Governor's pardon which the gang claims is illegal, because given for a direct contempt.

Every newspaper of importance in the state is denouncing Leahy. In sentencing me he called me "a political harlot," "worse than a skunk" and other vile names. He called another newspaper man who defended me "a fat-headed semi-imbecile." If Leahy can silence me by his method of refusing change of judge, change of venue, trial by jury, etc., no newspaper man is safe. I must fight it out. I will.

Carl C. Magee, editor of the Albuquerque (N. M.) State Tribune, who during the last 4 years has fought so courageously for freedom of the press, is 51 years old.

He has been a newspaper editor and publisher only since 1920, during which year he became owner of the Albuquerque Morning Journal.

He had come to New Mexico from Tulsa, Okla., then, because of his wife's ill health. He started his first newspaper work and his first newspaper fight at one and the same time.

His bankers called in loans when he exposed a deal in which the banks profited to the State's loss. This forced him to sell his newspaper, and for a while he continued to combat through Magee's Independent, a weekly.

In 1922 he bought the State Tribune, and backed by the Scripps-Howard organization, continued the battle.

Prior to this brief but exciting newspaper career, largely devoted to struggles such as described above, Magee was for 20 years a lawyer practising at Tulsa, Okla. He was born at Fayette, Ia. He received degrees from Iowa State Teachers' College in 1894, and from Upper Iowa University in 1889.

In 1895 he married Grace C. Griffin of Cedar Falls, Ia.

LEAHY LEADING MARCH OF JUDGES TOWARD DESPOTIC RULE FROM BENCH

By ROBERT P. SCRIPPS

Editorial Chairman, Scripps-Howard Newspapers

THE outstanding fact in the Magee contempt case is that Judge Leahy attempts to go a step farther than other judges have already gone along the road of usurpation of arbitrary power by the court, and if he is successful to take the whole American judiciary with him.

First we have in this country the power of judges to punish for contempt committed actually in the presence of the court. The idea was to prevent acts in the court room that might interfere with the conduct of a case or tend to intimidate witnesses or jury.

Also we have the power of injunction, to prevent a person or corporation from repeating a harmful act the legality of which was questioned, pending the outcome of a trial.

Now judges fight for "constructive" contempt. That means that somebody outside the courtroom altogether has published news or views about a case in court, or an individual or corporation involved in such a case, that the judge considers prejudicial.

ROBERT P. SCRIPPS

Also the "constructive" idea has been applied in citations for violations of court injunctions—the publication of matter that in the judge's opinion might influence someone to violate such an injunction.

The fundamentally un-American thing about all such proceedings is the arbitrary position assumed by the judge. He is complaining witness, jury, and judge in one. He cites, he adjudicates, and he sentences. The only check upon him is a brother judge in a court of appeal, or an executive officer with pardoning power.

And Leahy would set aside the executive officer!

He says to the Governor of New Mexico, "You may pardon for murder, you may pardon for rape, even though a jury has fixed guilt, but you cannot pardon for contempt, in a case where I have used my own judgment."

This makes the Magee case vitally interesting nationally, aside from the great wrong that is threatened against Magee, the New Mexico State Tribute and the readers of that paper. It is especially so to newspaper men everywhere. Other judges had already gone too far. But at the rate Judge Leahy is going it would not be long before a judicial guild or association could absolutely run this country and every newspaper in it—and probably would.

What this country needs is a constitutional amendment to prevent State and Federal judges from arbitrarily interfering with the rights of free speech and assembly by any means whatsoever. If contempt is to be charged and punished, let it be charged before and judged of by a jury, and in every other respect treated like any other alleged serious offence.

HEARST WINS A. P. PROXY VOTE ON ROCHESTER AND BALTIMORE

Membership Declines to Grant Patterson and Gannett Applications—Hearst Manager and Rochester Publisher Issue Statements

THE Rochester (N. Y.) Times-Union and the Baltimore Evening Sun failed of election to membership in the Associated Press at a special meeting held at A. P. general headquarters, New York, July 31.

Vote on the application of the Evening Sun stood 565 in favor of election with 335 against out of a total of 900 votes cast.

Of a total of 840 votes cast, 500 were in favor of election of the Times-Union with 340 against.

A four-fifths majority was necessary to election.

Frank E. Gannett, editor and publisher of the Times-Union, in a formal statement issued following the meeting, declared he was undecided whether or not he would re-enter his application at the next annual meeting of the A. P.

J. Edwin Murphy, managing editor of the Evening Sun, said his newspaper had no present intention of carrying on the contest.

Both newspapers applied for membership at the annual A. P. meeting held in New York last April. Their applications were contested by Arthur Brisbane, A. P. member for the Baltimore Evening News, a Hearst newspaper, and Harry Gray, member for the Rochester Journal and Post-Express, an evening newspaper, which is also owned by Mr. Hearst.

Subsequent heated debate at the annual meeting ended in the call of the special meeting just concluded.

Vote was cast by proxy. Gray was not present. Hearst interests were represented by Brisbane, Bradford Merrill, general manager of Hearst Newspapers, Victor Polachek, and William De Ford, Hearst attorney. Gannett attended for the Times-Union, while Paul Patterson and J. E. Murphy were proxies for the Evening Sun.

Charles W. Danziger, managing editor of the Pittsburgh Chronicle-Telegraph and J. H. Zerbey, Jr., of the Pottsville Republican were present at the meeting.

Mr. Merrill said:

"I think the result of the meeting is of great importance to all the members of the Associated Press because the decisive result increases the value of their memberships. I know that a good many members who like Mr. Paul Patterson and Mr. Gannett refused, nevertheless, to vote for them because they believed the principle involved in the election more important than any individual. I have good reason to know that among the several hundred members who did not cast any vote nor send any proxies there were many who desired the defeat of the applicants as a matter of principle, but did not wish to vote against some of the directors and officers of the Associated Press who did all in their power to change a rule that has prevailed in this organization for nearly thirty years by common consent and with general approval. It is too bad that personal animosities entered into a contest that should have been and was decided on principle alone."

Victor Polachek made the following statement:

"The result of the vote shows that Associated Press members are not inclined to permit personal considerations to hold validity in discussions regarding violation of the sanctity of right of priority over competitors in one's own city."

Mr. Gannett issued the following statement:

"First I want to express my deep appreciation of the support given by 500 members of the Associated Press to my application for membership for The Rochester Times-Union. To each and every one of these members I am grateful. It is a significant thing when that many members, almost a majority of the entire membership, and 28 percent more than a majority of the members who cast their ballots, voted to override the protest rights in Baltimore and Rochester.

"After all the literature that was issued on this case, it is apparent that many did not grasp the significance of the issue. Many were confused about it. This was not a personal matter at all. Mr. Hearst's organization attempted to make it appear that we were capitalizing prejudice in an effort to secure membership. That was not so. This was not a personal matter in any sense. If someone else besides Mr. Hearst had been in this same situation our case would have been just exactly as strong.

"My contention is that the A.P. cannot afford to permit its news sources to be controlled by the owner and promoter of a competing wire service. How any member can disagree with that view I cannot understand. No man can be loyal to two masters. In Rochester the A.P. must depend on the Hearst paper for its news. Where then does the International News Service, controlled by Mr. Hearst, get its news? One of the members in voting said that one week Mr. Hearst's representatives were in his office seeking a proxy which they obtained. The next week Mr. Hearst's representatives called and tried to sell him the I.N.S. wire service with the argument that it was superior to the A.P. The member began then to see the light and reversed his proxy. It is too bad that more did not realize the situation in the same way.

"I feel that the Associated Press more than I, personally, has lost by the result of the vote. The Rochester Times Union is the leader in its field, the leading paper in circulation and advertising in New York State outside of New York City and Buffalo. It has risen to supremacy without the A.P. service and if the members of the A.P. so prefer will continue to thrive without the A.P. service. But I have five other memberships in the A.P. and I know how it would strengthen the A.P. in New York State to have the Times-Union a member. I entered my application at the suggestion of A.P. members who felt the same way about it. And so it is a matter of greater importance to the A.P. than to the Rochester Times-Union. I do not overlook the fact however, that I should be glad to have a membership for the Times-Union, and what I say about Rochester applies to Baltimore as well. As an A.P. member, regardless of my own case, I should like to have news from Baltimore from the Baltimore Sun and not be dependent upon the news from Mr. Hearst's Baltimore paper.

You ask whether I shall re-enter my application. I am not decided about that but I feel, as I said above, that the whole matter concerns the A.P. more than it does me. The board of directors of the A.P. were 14 to 1 in favor of the applicants because they felt that our election would promote the best interests of the A.P. But these directors could not, under A.P. rules, take an active part in this contest. What a situation! It is absurd to think of rules so tying the hands of the directors of any corporation or club that the directors cannot promote the best interests of the organization they control.

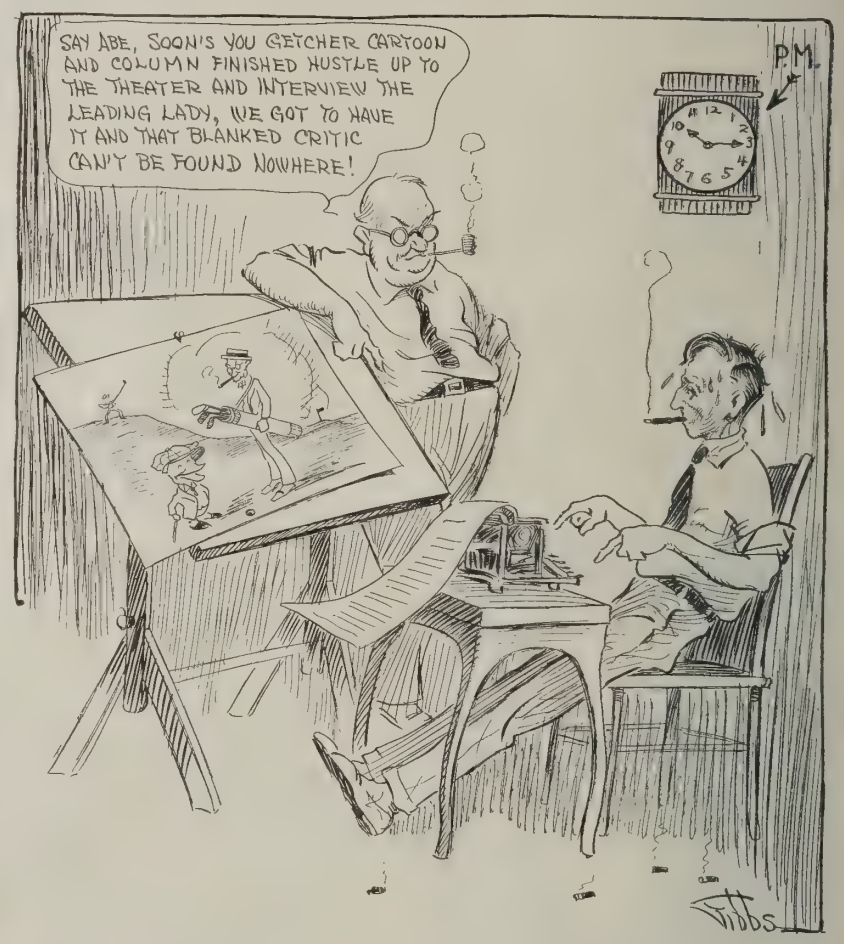
"If the members of the A.P. had known how the A.P. directors felt on the question of these applications; if they had known what the directors know, I believe they would have overridden the protest rights and elected the applicants. I am wondering if the present condition is going to prevail indefinitely in the A.P. or whether some way will not be found so that the board can say to the members: "We need the Rochester Times-Union and the Baltimore Sun as members and advise their election." Would the members hesitate to vote "aye" in such a case? I think not.

"Some members in their votes against us said that the A.P. should enforce in Rochester and Baltimore loyalty to the A.P. and obedience to the A.P. rules. But how can this be done? This has been attempted before with Mr. Hearst. In each case it meant a long, costly lawsuit and in one case, the Oakland case, Mr. Hearst won. How can the A.P. correct conditions except by electing desirable members in every city where Mr. Hearst or the owner of any other competing news service controls the news sources?

"I am delighted with the showing we made in the vote. I believe the fight has been worthwhile and that it will lead ultimately to an awakening of the full membership to a realization that the conditions in Rochester, Baltimore, San Antonio, in the afternoon field, and Milwaukee, in the morning field, cannot continue."

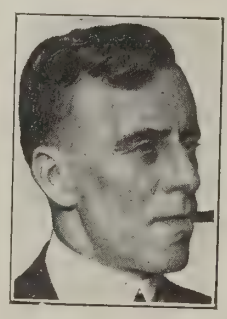
Frank B. Noyes, of the Washington Star, president of the Associated Press declined to comment on the result of the vote.

Frederick Roy Martin, assistant secretary and general manager of the A.P., would not disclose how the different members voted.



Attending the regular monthly meeting of the executive committee held Thursday afternoon, besides Noyes and Martin were, E. H. Butler, of the Buffalo News, first vice-president; C. P. J. Mooney, of the Memphis Commercial Appeal, second vice-president; Melville E. Stone, secretary. J. R. Youatt, treasurer; Charles Hopkins Clark, Hartford Courant; Elbert H. Baker, Cleveland Plain Dealer; Adolph S. Ochs, New York Times; B. H. Anthony, New Bedford Standard, and Robert McLean, Philadelphia Bulletin.

ALL IN THE DAY'S WORK



Drawn Exclusively for Editor & Publisher

By C. M. "ABIE" GIBBS

He Looks Like His Favorite Character

CLAUDE MARTIN GIBBS is the full name; in polite society he says C. Martin; strictly business, C. M.; but in the intimacy of his personal friedships nobody ever calls him anything but "Abe."

C. M. Gibbs

"Abe" is not so long as he is lean, and his best pose is the half jackknife that he does over his drawing board. In his youth he allowed Cincinnati to have credit for his residence. He went to school when he was young, also in Cincinnati; and in that same town shook off his callowness in the elementaries of draftsmanship. But the urge was for the craft, and he got his start in Baltimore with the Evening Sun as cartoonist and later as sports writer and illustrator, about 12 years ago. There he stuck until recently, when he was taken into the Hearst camp and is now doing his cynical sport stuff for the Baltimore American, throwing in a line of strictly original sport face caricatures of the big ones and one or two or three other incidentals.

They call him "Abe" after his famous grouch character, a lean old geezer with whiskers who knocks everything, and who is always accompanied by an optimistic Duck as a foil. Along with the pictorial comment in this combination, Gibbs writes a good-natured bottle of vitriolic suggestions about the bones being pulled by everybody in the sports game, and brings to his aid a keen knowledge of the game in all its departments. And he knows the game, too—knows it thoroughly and writes into his knowledge a humor that has made a big field of readers. His knowledge of the game and his style are the combination that get men into the syndicate runs.

"Abe's" recreations are as many kinds of work as there are departments of sports. Sometimes he goes home and plays with the three little boys who call him Daddy, and now and then he goes swimming or fishing with the man who writes "Songs of the Craft" for Editor & Publisher. But outside of that he gets most of his fun out of life by jackknifing his frame over the drawing board, making pictures of Abe and the Duck, and sitting at his typewriter hammering out short, swift, but kindly stabs at everybody and everything in general.

INTERVIEWING A GREAT DAILY NEWSPAPER

Conservatism Which Has Guided Newark News to Long Career of Success Dictates That Its Owners and Makers Speak Not as Individuals But for the Paper Only

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

I MET and talked to a newspaper this week, the Newark Evening News.

"Get a personality story," had been the dictum from the EDITOR & PUBLISHER and I had planned to write the careers of either Wallace M. Scudder, publisher, Edward W. Scudder, editor, or John W. Maynard, managing editor of the News.

Wallace Scudder, 70, founded the News in 1883 as a clean conservative newspaper and has never wavered from his first policy. Edward has ably followed his father's footsteps. For nearly 30 years Maynard has been associated with the News. It has been his school of journalism and his life work. Either one of the three would make good copy.

But, no. Really it cannot be done, I was told. Newspaper anonymity is perhaps nowhere more persistently practiced than on this daily in Newark across the Hudson from New York, which in 41 years of life under one ownership, has developed a personality very much its own. The only interview, which would be tolerated, it was plainly declared would be an interview with the newspaper.

"Everyone on this newspaper works for the newspaper, not for himself," one is told. "It is like in an army or a good baseball team. You will notice we never print by-lines over our stories. All the work our business, mechanical or editorial men do goes to build up the prestige of the newspaper.

"Why give publicity to certain reporters and not to others who as faithfully do their smaller but as important work each day? Every member of the staff cannot handle the 'big stories,' the ones considered by some newspapers as worthy of credit, but every member contributes in his way to the general success of the newspaper.

"If you credit the work of the man who brought in the scoop of the hour, why not give publicity to the printer who saw to it that the beat was made available to the thousands on the street?"

Besides the News believes that the use of signatures over stories tends to the expression of personal opinion in those stories rather than the facts. And the News reserves its opinions for the editorial page.

"Let the News talk for itself," was the order. Such an interview carried out proved decidedly entertaining to the writer.

I found the office of the News on Market street, Newark. Building alterations are underway. A new 4-story structure is being erected on the present site. At the moment, one half of the building is of bright white reinforced concrete, while its other half is of dingy brick. Within a year and a half, the new office will be completed.

It was after 11 o'clock in the morning, when I arrived outside the office. Trucks were drawn up to the curbstone, yawning to receive first copies of the News for suburban points and city stands. The News doesn't rush hastily into print each day. It has no "Sunrise," "Early," "Home" or other extra speedy editions. It cannot be purchased, in fact, until noon of press days on the streets of Newark, when the "Suburban Edition" comes off the presses.

There you have one distinct characteristic. The News does not suffer from the complaint all too common among American newspapers—the sickness of speed. It is healthy, slow, and has concomitant reliability.

While the prospective reader waits until 12 o'clock for a copy of the News, he finds stand after stand in Newark crammed with New York, Baltimore, Philadelphia and other Newark newspapers, yearning to be bought. These newspapers of course have considerable sale. Newark, a city of 450,000 population, has long been the stamping ground especially for New York circulators, hungry to extend their market. They have stamped loudly, but never to surpass the circulation of the News, which in its own good time, comes out daily to the tune of the largest subscription list of any newspaper in New Jersey.

Now it is noon and you pay 2 cents for your copy.

"Well, what have you got today? Something snappy? Something with a little juice in it?"

A NEWSPAPER TALKS

"Everyone on this newspaper works for the newspaper and not for himself."

* * * * *

"Printing plain unadorned accounts of human misconduct is a healthy deterrant to criminal tendencies."

* * * * *

"We believe that the reader may find plenty of entertainment in the news of the day. Comics and feature folderols are unnecessary."

* * * * *

"Healthy slowness brings reliability."

* * * * *

"Local news is the big spoke in the wheel; but no news should be overlooked."

* * * * *

"There should be no deep line of demarcation drawn between the editorial writer and reporter, so long as opinion is reserved exclusively for the editorial page."

* * * * *

"Editorial writers should obtain facts for opinions at first hand."

* * * * *

"A newspaper should be the training school for newspaper men."

This is reported to be a frequent question asked by a certain circulation manager of his managing editor. The latter probably is usually able to answer affirmatively, because his newspaper is generally known as sensational, smacking with accounts of human frailties and indecencies—"a little juicy" in the vernacular. This newspaper flourishes following this policy.

But the News has also succeeded, following a policy the exact antithesis.

"We try to reach the masses," says the editor of the sensational sheet.

"We try to reach the masses," says the News.

"We try to reach the worker who is without the advantage of education," says the sensationalist.

And the conservative News echoes the statement with the proviso that it strives to reach all classes.

One of the chief differences then seems to hinge on the opinions held by the two newspapers of the so-called masses. The News considers the "Masses" generally above the intelligence of sheep, goats, horses, and cows. The opposite newspaper prefers to whip its readers into attention.

All these thoughts cross the mind as one interviews the News by reading its orderly, clean, typographically clear pages. You know that Newark is not primarily a city of homes. It is an industrial city. And at the same time you are acquainted with the newspaper's circulation record.

One finds that the News does not overlook crime. Printing plain unadorned accounts of human misconduct it considers a healthy deterrent to criminal tendencies. It has the early Victorian attitude that the "young daughter in the home" should be the first consideration in the decision as to what is or is not printable. It maintained this attitude uninfluenced by the "naughty nineties."

The News claims that it published less on the Stillman divorce case than any other newspaper in the United States with the exception of the Christian Science Monitor; and that its circulation did not suffer. Parts of this case it considers as unprintable news. At the present time the News is carrying the Leopold-Loeb trial as dispatched from Chicago by the Associated Press.

For 41 years, the News has withstood the attacks of syndicate salesmen. Comic strips have never gained the space of its columns. The managing editor has seldom bought any syndicate features, despite their heralded circulation building qualities.

"We are told a newspaper cannot succeed without entertainment, and by entertainment is meant the average cripplewit syndicate feature, the 'trials of married life' or the unartistic comic strip," the News explains.

"We believe that the reader may find plenty of entertainment in the news of the day.

"I need no outside help. I am the newspaper of Newark and its suburbs," the News seems to say. "I am built up by people who live in Newark and its suburbs."

Of course the News obtains outside help in gathering its national and foreign news. Services of the Associated Press and the United Press are both used. Local news it considers the big spoke in the wheel. State news is carefully gathered. Because it is published in an industrial city, foreign news is given a good play.

So much of the newspaper's personality one gains from reading the News. Inside the office building the story is completed.

The editorial departments, one observes, are housed in one large room. The News has an editorial staff of 100 men and women. This number includes salaried writers in suburban, state, Washington, and foreign bureaus, but noes not include space writers. The majority of the staff members have been associated with the News from between 10 to 25 years.

The News, like Victor Lawson's Chicago Daily News, prides itself in being a training school for newspaper men. Cubs are started in the suburban bureaus as well as in the office. They begin work at a salary from $35 to $40 a week.

Suburban duties, the News believes, offer splendid training opportunities. The assignment is "all round." The reporter must cover the small city commission meetings, politics, the police court, civil court and general news.

Despite the sober policy of the News, writing is not held down to dry as dust exposition. Several features have been developed by News writers, but only one, a "Bedtime Story" has been offered for syndication. This is in line with the News' desire to make itself distinctive.

Co-ordination, it is pointed out, is the keynote of the editorial department. The News believes there should be no deep line of demarcation drawn between editorial writers and reporters, so long as opinion is reserved for the editorial page. Reporters frequently submit editorials, although the staff numbers 7 trained editorial writers. The managing editor has general supervision over both the news and the editorials.

The 7 editorial writers do not sit in sanctums gaining their opinions on world affairs exclusively from the perusal of daily papers, periodicals or books. They are frequently sent out into the field to report facts for the news columns and at the same time to delve deeper for inside information in order to make ripe editorial judgment possible.

For instance, an editorial writer was sent to the scene of the West Virginia coal mine disturbances. Press associations necessarily could carry only the highlights over their crowded wires. The editorial writer, a man of advanced education and experience, was able to dig deeper and uncover facts from which a firm foundation of opinion might be built.

In one outstanding way, the Newark daily has made its handling or news more efficient. From the city desk, the copy desk, and the telegraph desk, all stories pass over what is known as a central news desk. This provides a double check and has proved a fairly reliable insurance against inaccuracies.

Thus the News uses sober policies to bring smiling success. But it has not become Pecksniffian. It retains divine discontent and hopes and works for further improvement.

GEORGE HEARST NOW COAST PUBLISHER

Father Puts Him in Charge of San Francisco Examiner, Succeeding C. S. Stanton—Studied Newspapers in N. Y. Plant

George Hearst, 21, eldest son of William Randolph Hearst, has entered upon his new duties as assistant publisher of the San Francisco Examiner.

GEORGE HEARST

J. A. Callahan, business manager, is now general manager.

Hearst, with Mrs. Hearst, left New York about 3 weeks ago, with his father and mother, presumably to spend his vacation on the Hearst ranch at San Simeon, Cal. It was not known then that the San Francisco work was contemplated.

Both boys worked on the New York Mirror, when it first started. It has been rumored in New York, but not confirmed that George Hearst rather than his father, owns the Mirror, a morning tabloid.

AMERICAN A. A. C. W. DELEGATES SPEND "FOUR GLORIOUS DAYS" IN PARIS

Five Hundred Visit French Capital — Received by President Doumergue—Neal and Charles Decorated with Legion of Honor Crosses

By HERBERT C. RIDOUT

(London Editor, EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

(By Cable to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

AMERICAN advertising men and their wives who came to England for the 20th annual convention, A. A. C. W. closed their post-convention trip to Paris on July 29 and prepared to return to the United States. About 500 made the Paris trip. Many have already left for New York and Boston on various boats sailing from English ports. The majority will leave before Saturday this week.

French advertising men gave the Americans "four glorious days" in Paris, during which they were received by President Doumergue, two of their number were decorated with the Cross of the Legion of Honor, and excellent opportunity was offered for exchange of advertising ideas between representatives of both nations.

Jesse H. Neal, secretary of the A. A. C. W., and H. H. Charles, president of the Advertising Club of New York, were the two advertising men decorated by the French government. The presentation of the Legion Crosses was made by Camille Chautemps, Minister of the Interior, on July 28, following a banquet given the men from the United States by the Paris press.

Lou Holland, re-elected president of the A. A. C. W., who arrived back in New York Friday will be awarded the Cross of the Legion of Honor, also, despite the fact that he was only able to spend one day in Paris. The presentation will be made shortly in America, either by the French Ambassador or the French Ambassador of the French Consul.

The first section of the American advertising men arrived in Paris from London July 26. At Boulogne-Sur-Mer, where they first touched French soil, they were given a lengthy and enthusiastic reception. The people of Boulogne gave every woman member of the party a bouquet of flowers.

Arriving in Paris, they were met by Senator Paul Dupuy, owner of the Paris Petit Parisien, Marcel Knecht, general secretary of Le Matin, and Leon Bailby, owner of L'Intransigeant.

The morning of July 27, the delegates spent in a visit to the tomb of France's Unknown Soldier, after which they attended church. In the evening they dined in the beautiful one-storied Grand Trianon at Versailles, which Louis XIV built as a retreat from ceremonious court life.

Before the dinner there was a special playing of the fountains on the terrace of the gardens and a rapid tour of the famous chateau, including the Galerie des Glaces, in which the Allies signed the peace treaty with Germany.

The day was concluded with a fete at the basin of Neptune. There was music and the park was illuminated with a display of fireworks of the eighteenth century period. The trip to Versailles started at 3 o'clock from behind the Strasbourg statue in Place de la Concorde. The party boarded motors and was taken through the most attractive sections of Paris.

July 28 was one of the most interesting days of the Paris visit. In the morning, the advertising men were guests of the Municipality of Paris at the Hotel De Ville, where, following the speeches, Jarvis Wood, president of the Poor Richard Club presented to the city a gavel made from a cedar beam from the roof of Independence Hall.

In the afternoon the club members were received at the Elysee by President Doumergue. There Senator Paul Dupuy, publisher of Petit Parisien, the newspaper with the biggest circulation in France and the biggest daily circulation in the world, in a word of explanation to the President of the character of the associations to which his guests belonged, described the clubs and members as one of the most essential elements in the prodigious development of commerce industry of the United States.

"They are more than that," he added. "Their work is educative and makes for moral elevation."

The President in his reply laid emphasis on the principles of truth and sincerity which were the watchwords of the clubs and which he was glad to say were also of his countrymen in business. It was by such a community of principle as well as a community of interest that two countries could be bound closest together, he said. In the name of France, he thanked them for the interest and friendship which their visit showed.

"Mr. President, you look to me like a typical practical American politician," said Joe Grein, Chicago's millionaire newsboy, to President Doumerque.

"You've got a smile that's worth a million," added Joe, squeezing the hand of the French chief magistrate. M. Doumerque, only partially understanding, smiled again and thanked the Chicagoan, then conducting the visitors around the Elysee Gardens.

At the banquet which concluded this day of festivities, both the American and French Ambassadors at Paris and Washington participated.

The only regret expressed at the evening's festivities was the absence of Secretary of State Hughes, who also is a visitor in France. Senator Dupuy, who presided, gently chided Jules Jusserand French Ambassador to American, for "not dragging him along."

A rising ovation greeted M. Jusserand after Senator Dupuy had said, "President Coolidge told me, 'Don't take this man away from us; you can't replace him.'"

M. Jusserand, in a speech half English and half French, reviewed the American Ambassadors to France from Franklin to Herrick and spoke of the homage paid by the advertising men on Sunday, when they knelt before the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier.

American Ambassador Herrick, who received a long ovation from both the French and American guests made a plea for renewed interest in co-operation on the part of Americans in Europe.

The last day of the Paris visit was given over to the study of French advertising methods at first hand, as exemplified in the business section of the Agence Havas. Leon Renier, president of the board of directors of the news agency, received them in a new building devoted entirely to publicity.

In a large, beflagged reception hall before a large picture of President Coolidge, M. Renier toasted the advertising men's country, saying:

"France and America are two united States who love each other and work together."

Louis Wiley, business manager of the New York Times, for the Americans, and Marcel Knecht of Le Matin, for the Frenchmen, toasted France, President Doumergue and the Havas Agency.

M. Renier, explaining the different methods of publicity in America and France, said the Havas Agency did an annual business of 300,000,000 francs and handled the entire advertising of many large business enterprises and some of the largest newspapers. A score of English speaking Havas specialists escorted the advertising men through the building, described the methods of French publicity and exchanged ideas with their visitors.

HOUSTON DISPATCH BUYS POST FOR $1,150,000

Two Morning Dailies Merged and Issued as Post-Dispatch August 1—Post Founded in 1885 by J. L. Watson—Was Pioneer in Use of Modern Methods in Texas—Gov. Hobby Heads New Ownership

NEWSPAPER economics again worked their will in Houston, Tex., this week.

Roy G. Watson

Following lengthy negotiations, the 40-year-old Houston Post, a morning and Sunday paper, was sold to the Houston Dispatch, also morning and Sunday, which entered the field last December. Associated with R. S. Sterling and his colleagues of the Dispatch group in the purchase is former Gov. W. P. Hobby, publisher of the Beaumont (Tex) Enterprise and Journal, who succeeds Roy G. Watson, publisher of the Post, as president of the Houston Printing Company. New directors of this company, which combined the papers as the Post-Dispatch on Aug. 1, are: Messrs. Sterling and Hobby, Judd Mortimer Lewis, for many years a writer for the Post; George M. Bailey, also of the old Post ownership, and R. L. Dudley, editor of the Oil Journal. G. J. Palmer and A. E. Clarkson of the old board remain. The price paid is reported as $1,150,000.

Mr. Watson on Wednesday gave the following statement to Editor & Publisher:

W. P. Hobby

"I have disposed of my interest, practically two-thirds of the stock of the Houston Printing Company, to R. S. Sterling, local financier. The amount involved is $1,150,000. All minority stockholders receive precisely the same terms as the majority stockholders.

"I am entirely severing connections with the newspaper. While planning to spend a year or so in traveling, I have as yet no definite plans for future. I intend, however, to keep headquarters in Houston.

"Upon my resignation as president and that of some of my associates on the Board of Directors, Mr. Sterling appointed his representatives. They elected ex-Governor Hobby, who owns the controlling interest in the Beaumont Enterprise and Journal, as president. They announced that beginning August 1 the Post and Dispatch, a new morning paper in Houston, would be consolidated under the name of Post-Dispatch.

"With this consolidation I have had nothing to do. My interest terminated absolutely with the sale of my stock. G. J. Palmer, formerly vice-president and publisher, and A. E. Clarkson, secretary - treasurer and business manager, remain as members of the new board of directors.

Judd Mortimer Lewis

"I was especially glad in disposing of my interest in the Post to do so to local interests, rather than to outside capital. I was represented in the negotiation by local Attorney Wharton Weeks."

The Post Building will be sold by the new owners and the plant will be moved to a two-story building now being erected by the Dispatch. Its last statement shows the actual net assets of the Post as $550,000. The property therefore sold for $600,000 more than the actual visible assets. Mr. Watson owned the majority interest and secured $475,000 for his own stock. The entire capital stock of $300,000 was bought for $900,000. The purchaser assumed debts to the amount of $250,000.

Founded in 1885 by J. L. Watson, the Post was a pioneer in the use of modern methods in Texas journalism. It was long ago recognized as one of the best newspapers in the state and is regarded as one of the leading Democratic newspapers of the nation. Upon the death of Mr. Watson in 1897, the conduct of the paper was left to a board of trustees, acting for his son, Roy G. Watson, then a little more than 6 years old. These trustees, Col. R. M. Johnston, G. J. Palmer and H. F. MacGregor, were directed by the elder Watson's will to administer the affairs of the paper until Roy Watson's 25th birthday, when control should pass to him.

Meanwhile, the boy went to school, was graduated from Princeton, studied and traveled in Europe, lived for several years in California and in Chicago, and several months before the trusteeship expired, he returned to Houston to familiarize himself with local conditions. He took charge of the Post in 1917 and shortly afterward Col. Johnson retired from his editorship, which had been marked with distinction.

Under Roy Watson's direction the Post took the most advanced stands in editorial and advertising policies. For almost 5 years, the Post did not carry a line of medical advertising. It was a bold step and no doubt helped in the purification of medical advertising standards, but it was not followed by the Post's contemporaries, and a year ago the Post modified its restrictions.

Two years ago an evening edition was established in competition with the two evening papers already occupying the field, but its early prospects of economical and profitable conduct were not fulfilled and it was discontinued several months ago, the Post returning to its old operation of a morning and Sunday paper.

Mr. Watson has been active in the common affairs of Texas newspaper men and in the work of the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association, as is his long-time associate, G. J. Palmer, vice-president and publisher of the Post.

Gov. Hobby is an old-timer in Texas journalism. He began his career as a correspondent for the newspaper of which he has just been elected president. He was born in Polk County, Tex., in 1878, the son of a Federal district judge, and all of his early newspaper experience was with the Houston Post, of which he eventually became managing editor.

In 1909 he went to Beaumont to help reorganize the old Enterprise and became its largest stockholder and served as its editor and manager until his election as Lieutenant Governor in 1915. He later was elected Governor of Texas.

On retiring from office he returned to the Beaumont Enterprise and in 1921 he and his associates purchased the Beaumont Journal. Both papers have been strengthened considerably during the past three years. Gov. Hobby has also been a strong force in Texas newspaper affairs and has been president of several state newspaper organizations.

Judd Mortimer Lewis, a director of the Post-Dispatch, was from 1900 to 1919 on the Post staff in various capacities. He got into newspaper work through the torrid channel of stereotyping, and before joining the Post was manager of the Kellogg Newspaper Company's ready-print and boiler-plate plant in Houston. First of all, though, he is a poet and a poet of childhood, at that, and he is a favorite with the youngsters of Houston. He transferred his "Tampering with Trifles"—a column of paragraphs—from the Post to the Chronicle in 1919.

PROWLING

I love to take my dictionary down
And browze among its pages, there to find
Words to fright kings and educate a clown
And eke divert the channel of my mind.
There are so many words that I might use,
So many strange companions on the list!
Bushels of synonyms from which to choose
And words to give a sounding phrase its twist!

Prowling with Webster! . . . A diverting game
Filled to its brim with wonder and surprise;
Finding a wild word I may catch and tame
To do its stunts before your very eyes!
I love to make one jump, or stand and bark,
Giving its paw awhile it wags its tail!
Hunting wild words is quite my favorite lark—
On rainy days it's never known to fail.

My thin vocabulary craves the food
Grabbed from the meaty Book by Webster writ;
Thousands of words to suit the ficklest mood
Lurk in the inky rendezvous of it.
And so I catch and tame them, make them do
All of their tricks, and laugh to see them play;
Webster's a lovely lane to ramble through—
Webster's a fine sport for a rainy day.

And so I love to get my Webster down,
Dig through his mysteries and hunt my game—
Bag the big words and cart them all down town
To work them into type above my name!
And so I catch and tame them, but alas! . . .
One sits with pencil poised, greater than I! . . .
The Copy Reader will not let them pass,
And I can only see them gasp . . . and die!

HECTOR FULLER QUITS RANKIN AGENCY

Resigns to Join National Cash Register Company as Director of Publicity —Twenty Years on the Indianapolis Star

Hector Fuller has left the William H. Rankin Company, New York, to accept the position of director of publicity for the National Cash Register Company, Dayton, O. He assumed his new duties Aug. 1.

Before entering advertising, Fuller gained considerable prominence as a newspaper man. Born in England in 1865, he traveled extensively as sailor, soldier and adventurer before settling down to 20 years with the Indianapolis News. He wound up as dramatic editor of that newspaper. During the Russo-Japanese War, he went to the Far East as a war correspondent, and was the first man to get into Port Arthur after it was besieged by the Japanese. He was arrested by the Russians as a spy and released through the influence of United States Senator Beveridge. On his return to this country, President Roosevelt invited him to the White House to relate his experiences.

During the world war he served with Dr. Garfield in the Fuel Administration and with Surgeon-General Rupert Blue in national health propaganda.

After that he joined the William H. Rankin Company as a writer of advertising and publicity.

Among other things in recent years, he has been personal representative of Sir Charles Higham in this country in many matters; handled for Sir Eric Geddes the announcements of the latter's becoming President of the American Dunlop Company; for Will Hays the successful battle against motion picture censorship in Massochusetts; in conjunction with Grover Whalen and Mr. Rankin the plans and announcements of New York City's Silver Jubilee; has interviewed all manner of famous men, including Lord Kitchener, General Stoessel, Count Katsura, President Roosevelt and Admiral Togo, who was a naval student on the same British ship with him when a youngster.

On July 28, he was given a farewell party by members of the Advertising Club of New York.

Revives Libel Action

Maurice Leon, a New York lawyer, on July 31 revived a libel action against the publishers of the Courier des Etats-Unis in New York by filing an amended complaint, the original having been dismissed by Justice Morschauser two weeks ago. He objects to an article published by the Courier on April 20 last, which referred to his $10,000 action against William Randolph Hearst for payment for legal services.

LET THE LITTLE CHILDREN LEAD YOU, CORY'S WORD TO EDITORS

Managing Editors Ought to Pull Their Trousers Over Their Knees Occasionally and Play, Says Child-Story Writer —Married Men Make Best Editors

FIND out what little children like and you come nearest to answering that perplexing editorial puzzle:

"What does the public want?"

This opinion came this week from David Cory, the "Jack Rabbit man," who in an interview granted EDITOR & PUBLISHER whimsically suggested that many managing editors might profitably pull their trousers up over their knees occasionally and pretend they were boys again.

DAVID CORY

"It would do 'em a world of good," said Uncle Dave, and puffed dreamily at his stub of a cigar.

"Our newspapers, I think, need more humanity. They need the child outlook on life, which primarily is that if you follow the simple things of life, the big things will take care of themselves.

"I have found that the managing editor who has children of his own is full of humanity.

"His judgment as to what is entertaining, what is human interests, what is printable, and what will be read in the home is far superior to the average bachelor editor. And that's no joke."

David Cory believes American managing editors would make good children, if they tried it once in a while.

"They seem to have the necessary enthusiasm," he argued. "The ability to pick out bright spots from the drab realities.

"After all, most men are boys at heart. You can see that at the ball games, at Rotary Club luncheons. You can find it cleverly written down in Sinclair Lewis' 'Babbit.'

"And it's not so despicable as it seems.

"Anyhow, if the news writer realizes the fact that what children like is what the general public will like in subtler form, I believe it will help them a whole lot.

"He will know better how to play up the mystery story or the romance, how to write that exciting moment in the ball game, how to bring the tears or smiles, and how to win the affection of his readers."

Cory has gained a fairly good idea of what the children want. For 10 years now he has been writing them daily short stories in newspapers of the country. He started first with the New York Evening Mail and later went to the New York Evening World. Besides writing he has given thousands of talks to children in schools and over the radio. From the four corners of the earth, thousands of children have come to know him as Uncle Dave. During the past three months he has received more than 2,000 letters from children.

"The secret of successful child story writing," Cory contends, "lies in coming down to the child's level mentally. It is the same principle that applies to telling children stories. Never talk down to a child. Talk with him about things he knows about.

"This was brought home to me once, when one little boy of a group I was telling stories to, looked up at me wistfully and asked, 'Please, Uncle Dave, won't you sit down on the floor?'

"Sitting on the floor, you see, brought me down to his level. Now I always sit down on the floor beside my kid friends when I am telling them stories, and I bear the principle in mind when I write for them."

From letters he has received from circulation managers, Cory has reason to believe that children's departments in newspapers are splendid circulation builders.

"They make lasting friends for a newspaper," he pointed out.

He thinks that the newspaper which overlooks children makes a very faint appeal in the average home. Letters he has received show him that it is not only the children who are interested but the parents as well.

"Children make homes," said Uncle Dave. "Without a child's voice, or at least the memory of a child's voice, there is no home.

"And you know," he changed the subject, "one can learn a great deal from children. Every father learns to control himself through his own children rather than the ten commandments."

Until 10 years ago David Cory was only an "intermittent" writer. Only an occasional poem or short story found its way from his typewriter into print.

Born 52 years ago at Oyster Bay, N. Y., Cory spent his boyhood in the country. While he was still young, he moved out to a farm in Wisconsin. Returning to New York to make fame and fortune, he spent 27 years as a broker in Wall Street, playing with lambs and bears rather than jack rabbits.

During those years, his two sons, David Monroe and Daniel McGie Cory were growing up. David is now 21; Daniel, 19. When they were youngsters they used to like to creep into Daddy's bed mornings and ask for a story. Dad then forgot about the "Street" for a while to tell all about Little Jack Rabbit, Uncle Lucky, Old Man Weasel, Danny Fox, Hungry Hawk, or Lady Love in Rabbit land not far from Old Bramble Patch.

Then the war came. The Stock Exchange closed down and Cory found himself without work. He decided to use other talents as a means of making a living and began writing down the stories he had told his children.

It has paid him well, in happiness as well as dollars. Now his stories are being syndicated to more than 100 newspapers. They have been collected into 40 published books. He spends most of every summer, between daily stories and lectures, fishing at South Jamesport, L. I.

David M. and Daniel are too old now for idle tales. The former is abroad studying to be a clergyman. The latter plans to be a writer like his father. He has already had short stories published. Uncle Dave now has a universal family of children.

Last November, he called on the editor of the Rochester (N. Y.) Herald, and the next day the editor wrote an editorial about his caller.

"In finding his new work," the Herald editor declared, after telling how Cory had left Wall street, "David Cory also found a great content and happiness.

"It beams from his eyes and it is communicated to whomever he meets. Like an aura the spirit of universal childhood is about him, and when he talks it is not to grown-ups, but to that mystical cloud of little children that is always in his mind's eye. It is a wonderful thing to know that always cluttered about his knees, waiting eagerly for every word, is this great horde of trusting, faithful, adoring little children. We envied David Cory for the happiness that is his."

MACARONI FIRM CREATING NEW USERS THROUGH NEWSPAPER CAMPAIGN

Mueller Company Bans Competitive Copy to Tell Virtues of Products As a Food—Using 265 Papers to Reach the Public

By HAMMOND EDWARD FRANKLIN

THE sales manager who is fighting to take away business from his competitor instead of creating entirely new consumers from people who have never used any of either's type of product is burying his head in the sand.

Advertising agencies, for instance, are giving as much constructive thought nowadays to how they can develop advertisers out of non-advertisers as they are to trying to take away an account already well handled by another agency. The more progressive newspaper publishers are spending more time than formerly in bringing about new users of their space from the local and national field by thorough understanding and presentation of how their newspapers' local markets may be made to pay the advertiser.

So it goes through the manufacturing field. Some of our most successful newspaper advertisers no longer are selling simply their merchandise's name and points of merit in which they excel a competitor. They are creating new users from people who have never before been consumers of their or competitive products. Behind the latter advertising there has to be a clear-cut sales idea.

Most of the advertising of macaroni for years has consisted of copy which has emphasized the superior quality and flavor of the brand of the advertiser. Each company has sought to take away business from the other fellow. All too little work has been done to increase the total consumption of macaroni.

The first concrete forward step to place macaroni advertising on a broader basis was taken by the C. F. Mueller Company, Jersey City, N. J., maker of Mueller's Macaroni, some little time ago when this concern began printing recipes in its copy. These recipes suggested many uses for macaroni which were not generally known. In addition, macaroni recipe books were sent on request to housewives.

The company now is in the midst of a unique campaign, which from the standpoint of copy and the sales idea back of it, ranks as one of the best campaigns in the newspapers this year.

A list of 265 newspapers, backed up by supplementary publicity, is carrying this advertising which ignores competitors and centers its attention upon the great undeveloped possible market of women who ought to be using macaroni, but aren't. The campaign is the work of the Charles C. Green Advertising Agency, Inc., New York. It is typical of the creative type of work being done by the modern advertising agency.

It was evident to the C. F. Mueller Company that the only way to induce an increase in the consumption of macaroni was to persuade people to eat it in place of some other food they already are accustomed to eating. People cannot eat more food than they now are consuming. If they were to use more macaroni, it was argued, it would have to be at the expense of some other food. The potato, an article of food people eat most of, was selected as the target for Mueller effort.

"The potato was the logical point of this attack," Leroy Fairman of the Charles C. Green Advertising Agency stated. "Not only do people eat more potatoes than any other food, but it so happens that macaroni can be prepared easily in ways that make it an ideal substitute for potatoes. The Mueller brand can be cooked in only nine minutes and it is very easy to serve with butter, sauces, vegetables, with chicken fricassee, or prepared in the same manner as potatoes usually are by the housewife. This we brought out strongly in the copy.

"Macaroni is shown to be the superior of potatoes from a nutrition standpoint, and there is no waste in it while potatoes are composed largely of water. Macaroni can be prepared without either the labor or grimy hands inseparable from the preparation of potatoes."

These points made telling copy in favor of shifting from potatoes to macaroni and of course in particular to Mueller's. It is copy which starts from the reader's standpoint, as most successful advertising has the knack of doing.

Illustrating Mueller's Macaroni advertising to newspaper readers.

The reader is invited to send for a book of 43 recipes. A comparative table, showing the calory value of macaroni contrasted with potatoes establishes a convincing case. Having presented the negative and some of the positive arguments, each advertising shows a woman using the product and sums up tersely reasons for serving Mueller's Spaghetti or Macaroni "as you do potatoes." The name of the brand is featured and at the bottom in a panel hinting of wheat appears the suggestion, "Never be without Mueller's in your pantry."

All through, the fact that Mueller's "cooks in 9 minutes" is given prominence. Nor is the company's regular slogan, "With the better taste," overlooked.

The same fundamental macaroni-instead-of-potatoes idea appears in the company's posters and street car cards and in lithographed three-piece window trims.

The salesmen who call on the trade on behalf of the Mueller Company have been posted thoroughly as to all angles of the idea and have been able to interest the trade in it. The line already stood well with the retailers.

Letters have been sent out by jobbers to retailers in their territory. The newspapers have done a large amount of work upon the retail trade and in their sales aid publications have given publicity to the campaign. The Lewiston (Me.) Evening Journal devoted a full page on July 14 to a sermon on summer advertising, with the Mueller campaign as a text.

The newspaper copy started late in June. It appears on the average of two insertions per week through the latter part of August. As previously mentioned, the list of newspapers is large. The company does not sell west of Detroit or south of Washington, but is a big factor in the East.

The Charles C. Green Agency had no hesitance when asked their attitude toward the value of newspaper advertising in a problem of this type.

"To meet the conditions as outlined," a member of the company stated to EDITOR & PUBLISHER, "there is no medium which can come anywhere near doing the job except newspapers.

"Even if Mueller's had national distribution, we do not see how any other medium except newspapers could put over a campaign of the nature of this one. Posters, street car cards, and so forth are an excellent secondary means of backing up this campaign, but we would certainly be at a loss to put over a big job of this campaign's kind without the newspapers."

In some cases, advertising which is aimed at capturing business from competitors seems necessary. More often advertising which ignores competition and goes out to create a larger consumption of the general type of product and, incidentally, the manufacturer's own brand, brings home the bacon.

ADDS EVENING EDITION

Lakeland Star-Telegram to Launch Second Paper August 4

The Lakeland (Fla.) Star-Telegram, on Aug. 4 will begin publication of an evening paper in conjunction with its morning publication of the same name.

When the Morning Star and the Evening Telegram were consolidated in September, 1922, it was announced that publication of an evening edition in connection with the morning paper was planned.

Since then $25,000 worth of new equipment has been added to the plant to accommodate the evening publication.

Lynn W. Bloom and Harry L. Brown are owners of the two papers. They published the two Lakeland papers before consolidation. Additional news services, as well as new features, have been contracted for.

Police Ban Lifted

The order issued by the Portland (Me.) chief of police, prohibiting newsboys from selling papers after 9 o'clock at night, has been rescinded. This affected the early evening editions of the Portland Press Herald, as well as the Saturday night editions of the New York and Boston Sunday newspapers.

Flames swept the building of the Cambridge (Mass.) Chronicle, one of the oldest weekly newspapers in New England, the evening of July 26, occasioning a loss of $25,000. Presses, linotype and other machinery were put out of commission.

Satisfaction and Growth

The satisfaction of advertisers and advertising agents with results from their announcements inserted in The Sun, New York, is reflected materially in The Sun's great advertising gain—the greatest gain made thus far this year by any newspaper in America.

HAL HOSS AGAIN HEADS OREGON EDITORS

Reelected President at Tillamook Meet July 25-26—Name 4 Regional Vice-Presidents—Roe, Gauss, Duncan Speakers

Greater co-operation among the smaller newspapers of the United States was urged upon the members of the Oregon State Editorial Association in its seventeenth annual session at Tillamook, Ore., July 25 and 26, by Herman Roe, of Northfield, Minn., vice-president of the National Editorial Association, one of the principal speakers at the gathering.

"One of the greatest drawbacks in making recommendations of rates to country newspapers lies in the fact that cost systems are seldom kept and adequate operations information is not available."

Hal E. Hoss, of the Oregon City Enterprise, was re-elected president of the association. A new system was adopted whereby vice-presidents were chosen for four geographical divisions of the state as follows: A. G. Rae, of Tillamook, for Western Oregon; J. D. Thomison, of Hood River, Central Oregon; Earl Richardson, of Dallas, Willamette Valley, and A. L. Mallery, Oakland, Southern Oregon. G. Lansing Hurd, of Corvallis, was again elected secretary-treasurer.

More than 150 delegates attended the convention. Among the speakers was Dr. Christian Gauss, head of the Department of Modern Languages, Princeton University. Dr. Gauss made the principal address at the annual banquet.

Charles W. Duncan, advertising councilor of Foster & Kleiser, of San Francisco, urged the necessity of watching closely the ethics and truth of advertising matter accepted. The great gains in advertising of the past decade, he said, were due to the improved standards observed by the newspapers and by advertising men generally.

NEW AND AUTHENTIC HISTORY OF THE HERALD OF THE BENNETTS

Herald Pioneers in Use of the Telegraph

When Morse first invented the electric telegraph in 1844, Mr. Bennett made a close study of the discovery, but capital was not to be had immediately for the costly experiment of stringing wires on poles across the country, and it was not until early in 1846 that the work of connecting Washington with New York by wire was completed.

On November 29, 1845, the following announcement appeared in the Herald:

"ELECTRIC REPORTS—ARRANGEMENTS OF THE HERALD—We have now completed our arrangements for the reports of Congressional proceedings, during the session of the Congress which assembles on Monday next, having in conjunction with some other morning contemporaries, concluded a contract with the Magnetic Telegraph Company, for the supply of reports during the whole of the session.

"The Herald by means of this arrangement, will, as usual, be the first, or one of the first, in the present instance, in the publication of intelligence. For some weeks to come, the reports of Congressional matters will not reach this city until three o'clock of the following morning, inasmuch as the whole electric route between Washington and New York is not yet completed. As soon, however, as the wires are extended from the one city to the other, we shall receive an account of the proceedings yet warm, we might say, from the mouths of the speakers; so that on the same evening we shall be able to go to press with an account of the proceedings of the same day, up to the adjournment, for our morning publication. * * * *

"We have hesitated at no expense and spared no exertion to accomplish this desirable end, and that our labors are appreciated by a discerning public, the immense and constantly increasing circulation of the Herald, which is to be met with in the remotest corners of the union, is pregnant evidence. Also our corps of reporters will be on the spot to give an account of all such interesting matters and important details as could not be communicated to the magic wires."

It was not however until May 8, 1846, that the Herald actually secured a regular telegraphic service from Washington, the despatches first being headed, "By the Magnetic Telegraph"; later, however, being changed to "Electric Telegraph." The messages were brief and no doubt costly, while frequent break-downs of the lines interfered with the regularity of the service.

Mr. Bennett, however, at times ordered full reports of important news telegraphed, regardless of cost, much to the discomfiture of his contemporaries, and one morning the Herald electrified the nation by printing the entire lengthy speech that Calhoun had delivered the night before in Washington.

The completion of the telegraph line to Boston on July 17, 1846, was also of great benefit to the Herald, as the Cunard steamships at that time ran to Boston.

In 1847, the Herald regularly carried a column or more of news by telegraph, but when the exigencies of space permitted a crude illustration headed the columns, showing an electrical man, labelled "Herald," flying along the wires.

Mr. Bennett Bears Official Dispatches to London

Mr. Bennett had done much editorially to clarify the features of the Oregon boundary dispute with Great Britain, and found himself wholly in accord with the policies of President Polk's administration as to this knotty problem. The enemies of the President sought to undo his statesmanlike negotiations to settle the question peacefully, and he found an able and powerful ally in the proprietor of the Herald. So it was an appreciated courtesy when Mr. Bennett, on the eve of his departure for Europe, was entrusted with the delivery of important despatches concerning the treaty, to the U. S. Minister in London, from James Buchanan, then Secretary of State. The United States Senate in June, 1846, accepted the treaty as drafted, thus averting the chance of hostilities, which had been so pointedly hinted at, in the campaign slogan of "Fifty-four forty or fight."

Mr. Bennett, with his wife, child and a servant, sailed for England on June 16, arriving in London on June 28, and was well received in certain influential quarters, albeit the London Times showed its hostility to the now admittedly prominent Scotch-American editor. The criticisms of his paper highly amused Mr. Bennett, who spoke of "editorial jealousies" and "insular narrowness."

His time was fully taken up between his business and social engagements. On July 5 he dined with Prince Louis Napoleon, shortly after his marvellous escape from the fortress at Ham, and long afterward, when Napoleon had become Emperor of France, Mr. Bennett and his wife were honored guests at the Tuileries.

Mr. Bennett and his wife made a lengthy stay in Europe, touring over almost the entire continent, and his letters, beginning July 22, 1846, were admittedly brilliant descriptions of the politics, social and economic conditions of the European nations.

During his prolonged absence from America, the Herald prospered, and though Atree had left the staff in 1844, Frederic Hudson, his brother, Edward W. Hudson, and other able journalists fully maintained the paper's high standard of excellence, while its circulation rose to 40,000 copies daily and weekly. For years Mr. Albro was foreman in the composing room, and Billings Hayward was in charge of the proofreaders. The latter had been part owner of the old Transcript, which failed in 1839, and he shortly afterward joined the staff of the Herald.

In June, 1846, Mr. Bennett began the issue of the "Herald For Europe," which attained a large circulation, partly due to his arrangement by which upon receipt of a dime, the paper would be mailed from the office of publication direct to any address.

His Ship News department had already taken the lead, and his swift clipper, Teazer, met all incoming ships down the Bay.

The Dealer Was Disgusted!

A BIG dealer—and a close student of advertising—recently took on a highly specialized, nationally advertised line. He was sold completely on it; the copy, the layouts, the art work, were great—window displays and store tie-up stunning. Everything worked out beautifully until he received notice from the advertising agency that copy was scheduled for "such and such a" newspaper. Then he blew up.

The agency had selected a newspaper that he did not ordinarily advertise in—with whom his store had no identity—that he did not have an advertising investment in. Telegrams flashed back and forth—then the schedule was changed for copy to run in The Enquirer—and everybody is happy.

Space buyers that are watching Local advertising in The Enquirer are putting it on all National lists.

ANCIENT PRINTERS' MARKS TO ADORN NEW MILWAUKEE JOURNAL PLANT

Chosen as Highest Symbol of Community Service—20 Marks Selected—Oldest That of Fust and Schaefer, Germany, 1457

By JOHN R. WOLF

COMMUNITY service is the bold claim of nearly every publisher. News, advertising and illustrations are parts of this public service which are pointed to as the reasons for growth and success of American newspapers. Nearly every publication advises, instructs, entertains, creates desires and then satisfies them. Each publisher is tempted to look back and wonder if there ever was an age in which service to humanity was as vital a factor in the publishing business as it is today.

Some time ago executives of the Milwaukee Journal were studying decorations for their new $2,000,000 building. They sought designs that would carry out the idea of community service on which that newspaper was founded and on which it has continued for 42 years. After reviewing the classics, mythology and other works, the early history of printing was investigated. Here they found service to humanity so fundamental that it has lived through the ages in a thousand ways.

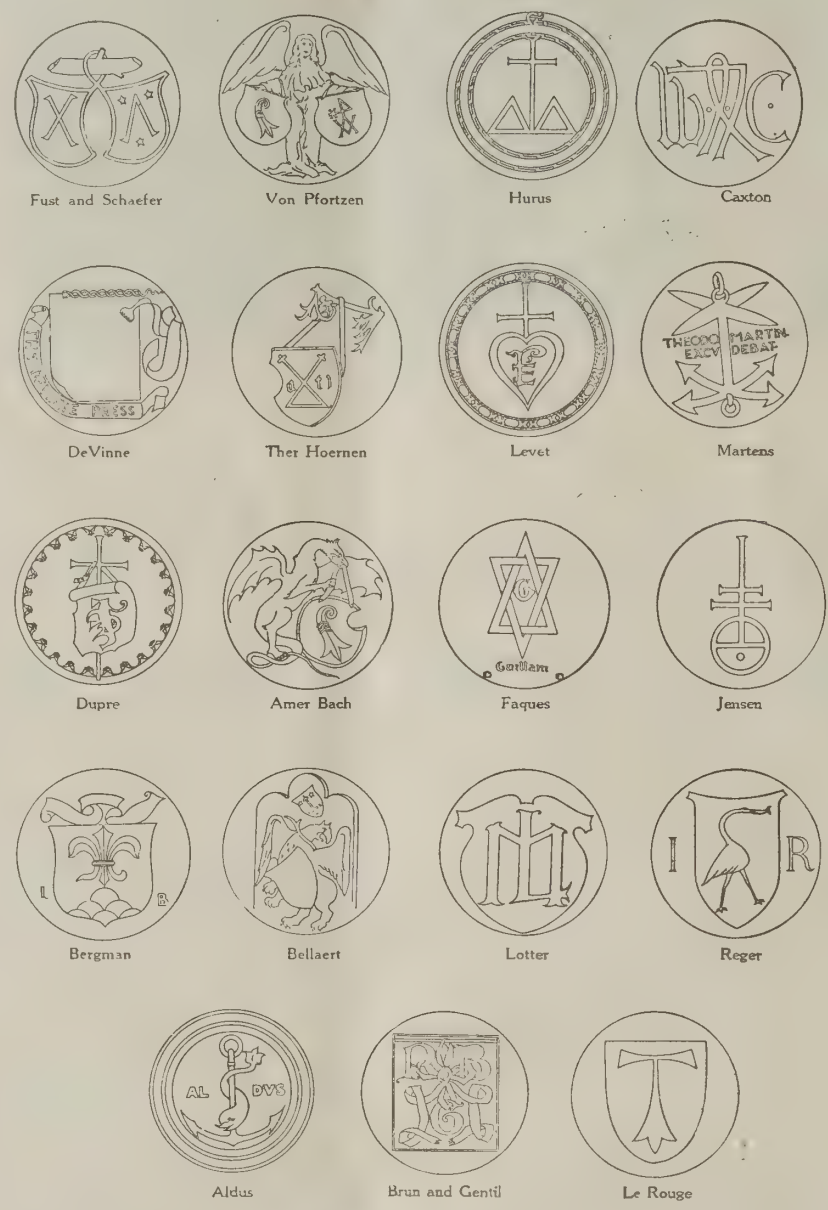
In reviewing the printers' marks of the fifteenth century it was found that the publishers who designed these devices made possible the discovery of America. They served the world and all posterity with the Bible. And they published works on which modern education is based. So great were their services to humanity that The Journal decided to feature their marks in the new building as the goal towards which the whole printing trade should strive. Twenty marks representing publishers of eight nations have been carved in stone and placed above the third story windows.

These include the designs of Fust and Schaefer, of Germany, the firm of printers who published the first dated Bible in 1457. This mark consisting of a stump supporting two shields bearing compositor's rules angled and crossed was the first design ever used in a printed book. It appeared in the third printed volume shortly after John Fust had learned the art of printing from Gutenberg, the inventor of imprinting from movable type. Today this insignia is used by printing craftsmen as an emblem of union and good fellowshirp.

Perhaps it is from the conceptions these publishers had of the service to mankind which printing was to perform that lead them to write the following colophon to the Bible.

"This book * * * made by the masterly invention of printing * * * is consummated to the services of God through the industry of John Fust and Peter Schoeffer."

Next in importance among the marks selected by the Journal is that of Johann Reger, also of Germany. This mark bearing a shield in which a crane is pictured eating a fish was used in Geographic Ptolemaeus, the geography which Christopher Columbus studied shortly before his exploration of the seas.



The mark of Aldus Manitus, an anchor circled by a giant fish, is the best known among the older designs. This is attributed to the fact that more than 126 editions of Greek and Latin classics were published on this press in less than 100 years. He too had the idea of rendering service to the world; for in his Greek Grammar he wrote a preface stating:

"I have made a vow to devote my life to the public service. Man is not born for pleasure, which is unworthy of a truly generous mind, but for honorable labor. Cato has compared the life of man with the tool of iron: use it well, it shines, cease to use it and it rusts."

William Caxton, the father of English printing from whom our own country learned the trade is of course included in the Journal's tablets. His mark consisting of his initials and the figure 74 (the significance of which has never been clearly explained) appears as it did in his early volumes. The mark of William Faques, also of England, who was the official printer for King Henry VII is also reproduced.

Other marks shown by the Journal also tell the spread of printing to various countries, each of which contributed in the way of arts and letters to the service of the press. In Germany aside from Johann Reger, and Fust and Schoeffer there were Arnold Ther Hoernen, who introduced the craft to Cologne, and Melchior Lotter, who carried it to Leipzig. France ranked next in the development of the craft with early printers such as Jean De Pre, and Pierre Levet, of Paris and Pierre LeRouge, of Chablais.

Italy had Aldus Manitus, and Nicholas Jensen both of Venice who popularized printing in their country. Switzerland saw its first presses in the shops of Jacob Wolf Von Pfortzen, John Amer Bach and Johann Bergman Von Alpe. In Spain Paul Hurus of Zaragoza, and Pedro Brun and Juan Gentil, of Seville, were the original craftsmen. Holland and Belgium owe the introduction of printing to Jacob Bellaert and Theodorie Martens.

Fathers of the Craft Honored on Walls of Milwaukee Journal Building.

The history of the craft in the United States is illustrated by the devices used by Benjamin Franklin and by the De Vinne Press. Stories of Franklin and his early struggles in Philadelphia have grown to be almost proverbial.

The most modern mark included in the Journal's exhibit is one from the United States, the De Vinne Press which is generally accredited with having contributed more to the development of typography and press work in America than any other organization. This press named after Theodore L. De Vinne, founder, is the forerunner of the present Century Press.

These, according to the Journal executives, make up a representative list of craftsmen, each of whom has served civilization by his work and has contributed something to the art of printing. Each mark is indicative of the service printers of today should render their communities and their people if printing is as much a service today as it was five centuries ago.

For the sake of fair play and accuracy

We believe that in view of the pressure under which the average newspaper is produced, the accuracy of its contents is remarkable. Occasionally, however, there is a slight inaccuracy, and this statement is published to show how even a slight and oftentimes natural inaccuracy can cause serious results to an important American industry. We believe it will appeal to the sense of fair play characteristic of newspaper men.

Here is the situation

During the past two weeks, and on other occasions during the past few years, the papers have carried news stories about botulinus poisoning cases resulting from eating ripe olives. Some of the recent stories referred to "imported ripe olives"—others to just "olives."

Here are the facts

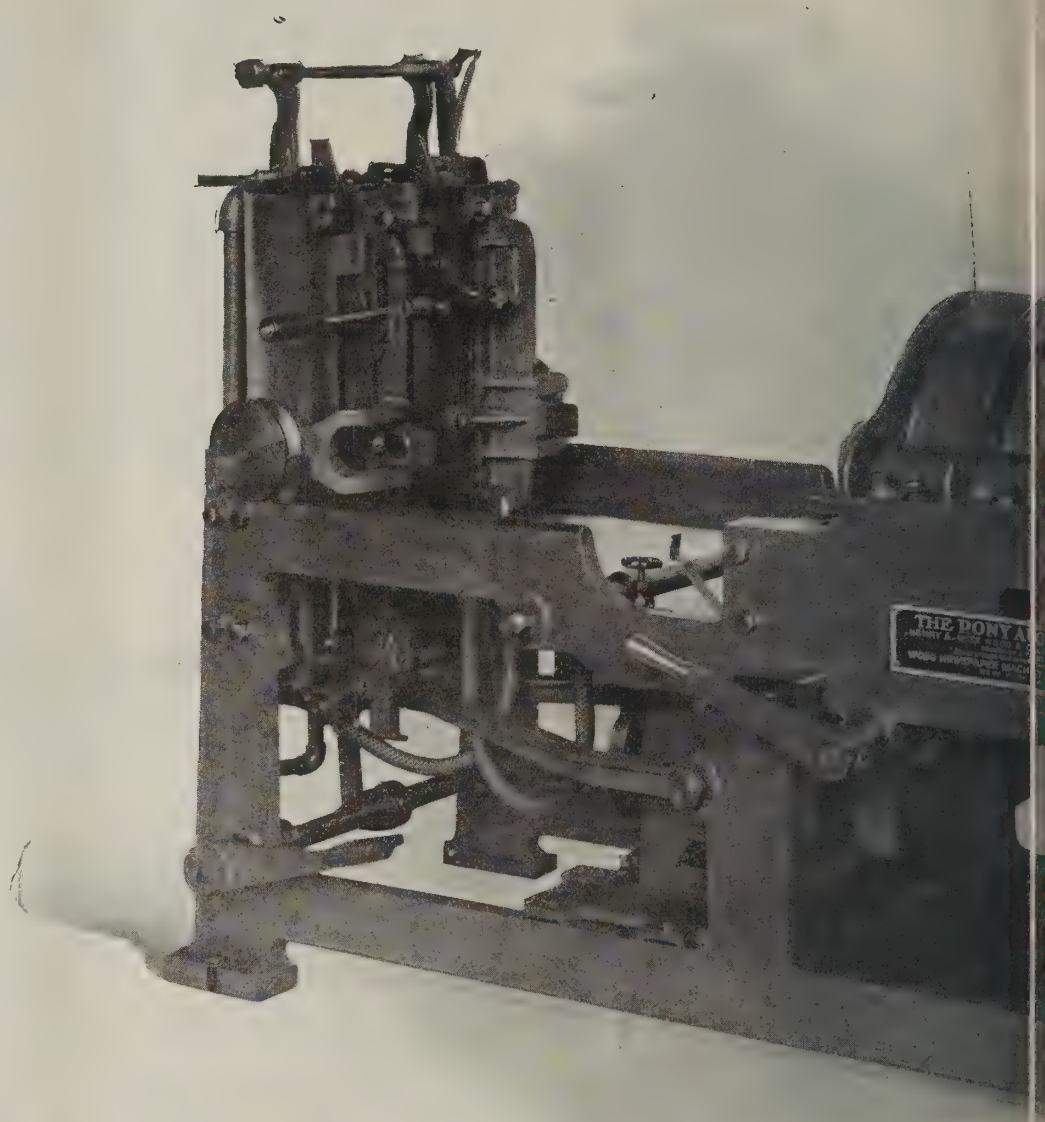
There are two kinds of olives sold in this country—green and ripe.

Practically all canned or bottled ripe olives sold in this country are grown, cured, packed and distributed within the United States.

All green olives sold are grown and cured near Seville, Spain. Peculiar conditions make it impossible to grow them successfully anywhere else in the world. Their importation, bottling and distribution is wholly an American industry. But when "imported" olives are mentioned, people naturally connect them with Spanish Green Olives. Green olives have never caused a single case of sickness or death from botulinus poisoning. Exhaustive chemical and other analysis proves they never can. Government bulletins have recorded this fact.

So isn't it only fair

To verify carefully every story about olives?



To state specifically the kind of olive involved?

To describe as "imported" only such olives as have been grown outside the United States?

We are confident that the newspapers want to give every American industry a square deal

EDITORIAL

JUDGE LEAHY'S THREAT

READING the account, elsewhere presented in the columns of EDITOR & PUBLISHER, of the instance of judicial tyranny in New Mexico, every conscientious newspaper man must experience first, a sense of shame that the majesty of our legal institution should be dragged to such depths and, second, a thrill of pride in a fellow-editor who has made a gallant stand, thoughtless of personal considerations, for a principle which concerns not only press freedom but the foundations of liberty and progress.

Free press is not a license to operate a profitable business; it is not a grant of privilege; it is essentially a constitutional obligation to serve the public welfare and in Carl C. Magee we have a man who has not shrunk from full, candid, direct response to that duty. Critics of the American press who have been charging that the fight has gone out of our journalism, that it has become supine and venal, that its only punch is on the keys of a cash register, may well look to the southwest and examine the facts in the case of Carl Magee. They will also see in that state the rank and file of newspapers denouncing the court for an unwarranted and violent usurpation of power which, by no stretch of the imagination can be justified by any principle of law or equity and plainly represents base and irresponsible emotions and motives.

Nothing could possibly be more incongruous in a democracy than a court of law which assumes, from whatever motive, arbitrary control amounting to autocracy and is, as Robert P. Scripps points out, complaining witness, jury and judge in one, holding as crime higher than the major felonies the "contempt" of an editor who has dared to speak in the presence of the court the truth as his conscience and intelligence has found it.

No liberal mind can fail to draw from the incidents, as described by Mr. Magee, anything but travesty upon American institutions. If any newspaper man thinks this is something foreign to his life and his principle, for instance because it has occurred in a distant community amid crudities of Mexican people largely unfamiliar or perhaps unsympathetic with our idealism, let him remember that the same flag covers it, that law is based on precedent, and finally that in the background of this situation is a smoldering political fire the murky vapors of which have only recently been in the nostrils of Americans everywhere.

Mr. Scripps says that the solution lies in a constitutional amendment which would prevent state or federal judges from arbitrarily interfering with the rights of free speech, press and assembly and if contempt is charged let it be tried like any other offense.

This seems like a long reach back to the original principles of freedom in this country. Must we thresh over and over again, defining and redefining, amending and reamending such obvious principles as those set forth in the Bill of Rights? Evidently, this is our course. Washington anticipated it when he warned in his farewell address against the spirit of encroachments tending to consolidate the powers of departments, creating despotism. "A just estimate of that love of power, and proneness to abuse it which predominates in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position," was his penetrating view of the great menace to liberty.

If a constitutional amendment is necessary to convince the judiciary of the injustice of such encroachments as those revealed by Mr. Magee, then let the wearisome process go on. The cornerstone of the arch of democracy must not and will not be knocked out by judges pretending to be a law unto themselves, or any other encroaching department of government.

Those who reason the subject know that there is an abuse of the law regarding contempt. Conscientious newspaper men are among the worst sufferers. It would seem that reform of this condition might very well come from the inside of the legal system. Is it a cherished club? The subject will be relevant for newspaper discussion until a solution is found.

The closed mind is a tomb in which a living man buries himself and smothers.

EPHESIANS

CHAPTER IV. 25.

Wherefore putting away lying, speak every man truth with his neighbour; for we are members one of another.

FOLLOW BIG INTEREST THROUGH

WESTERN newspaper men often criticize Eastern newspapers for inconsistency in following the interest of a big story to its concluding phase,—printing something in heavy display today, arousing interest and then leaving the reader in suspense. The criticism is not without point, but we do not feel that the East monopolizes the fault. However, this is what happened in New York recently: A story broke concerning the disappearance of seven young children who had borrowed a canoe and had ventured out on Long Island Sound. The canoe was picked up at a considerable distance, right side up, but the children had disappeared.

It was an agonizing story, deeply touching the hearts of parents and lovers of children, and the mystery of the tragedy must have become a household discussion in countless homes. A day passed, without trace of the children and there were appropriate follow stories. However, with the mystery as impenetrable as ever two days later, two New York morning newspapers gave their readers no news concerning the fate of the children.

This writer happened to be on a train, entering New York. A stranger approached and asked to borrow a newspaper, saying that his paper "had nothing about those children lost in the Sound." One newspaper in our possession also was without news, but a second paper had a brief and satisfying follow story on an inside page, and this the stranger read with keen interest.

When you have stirred the imagination of your readers with mystery you may depend on it that such curiosity will be satisfied, whether by you or a rival.

We are reminded by the Nation that J. Ramsay MacDonald is a journalist by profession and that, as such, he has demonstrated an ability, "approaching almost to inspiration," in his high office, which reflects the instinctive journalist possessed of unlimited sympathies and broad outlook.

NEEDLESS SACRIFICE

THE publisher of an old and honorable newspaper in a small city advises EDITOR & PUBLISHER of his problem, as follows: For many years the newspaper, alone in the field, has loyally supported the interest of the local merchants and has refused to accept advertising from merchants of a nearby city although the latter have clamored for space in an obviously rich advertising medium.

The local merchants, on the other hand, have not given the paper sufficient advertising to show the publisher a profit.

The publisher asks if, by all rules, he should not market his space, which is his single item of profitable merchandise, irrespective of the interest of his town's trade people who, he thinks, have forfeited their exclusive privileges.

If this is the whole story, and if it is true that ample notice has been given and rejection is definite it seems to us that the newspaper publisher has the right to so act without any qualms of conscience. It is a business proposition. It may be successful, depending upon the resourcefulness of the local merchants to resist, which will likely be limited, and the tenacity of the newspaper publisher.

At first blush one would think that it would be poor economics to assist an enterprise which would send from a town money which might circulate among the town's own people. The theory is sound if carried to a logical conclusion, but the practise appears to be that when other newspapers similarly situated have opened their columns to competitive out-of-town advertisers the results have not been disastrous to the town, but beneficial in that local merchants have aroused themselves to action, given better service to the community and have, in sheer self-defense, advertised in the local newspaper in a contest with the outside merchants. Some money goes out of town, to be sure, and some money comes into the town by reason of the economic shake-up.

There are numerous towns within a few miles of New York which are printing the business of New York retailers today which, a few years ago, refused this business in deference to local merchants, and we observe that nothing dire had happened to the town in question and local merchants who formerly refused to advertise are now regular space users.

We do not believe that any seasoned journalist would differ from us when we say that sacrifice to the point of suspension, in the circumstances as outlined here, could rationally be considered other than unwarranted and needless martyrdom.

The consistent Summer advertiser is getting in his "licks" when the other fellow is snoozing.

PURSUIT OF FIVE OUTLAWS

OUR animated friend, Edith Spencer, Los Angeles school teacher, concerning whom we addressed EDITOR & PUBLISHER readers last week, now writes that she has been interviewing New York editors in her campaign for five simple little rules of grammar in newspaper comics, and has been finding some of them hard boiled.

Miss Spencer's reform is elemental. All she asks is that the following familiar snide pearls be dropped from comics made for children: "Ain't," "you was," "I seen," "I done" and "I ain't gonna do nothin'." Children may think these quotations smart and form habits over which they may stumble for life. Miss Spencer is no crank. She enjoys good slang in comics, but sees no humor, sense or advantage and much harm in the five outlaws named.

She advises us that one editor, himself quite famous as a reformer in other directions, told her that, "Newspapers are in business for business, not for uplift"; another said, "Why should you impose your taste on others?" and a third said "Not interested a-tall." Not in the least defeated by these judgments the little school teacher hustled about through the hot July days and found a number of even more influential editors who thought very well indeed of her idea that newspapers should stop feeding children with five idiotic forms of illiteracy, in lieu of humor, and the lady declares that she will carry her fight to the next convention of the American Society of Newspaper Editors.

H. C. Witwer, who wrote "The Leather-Pushers" is writing the script for "Samson and Delia" for the King Features Syndicate, which claims it is the first national comic strip reflecting the public interest in boxing.

Charles McManus, who draws "The Newlyweds" is in San Francisco now, having just completed a vacation trip through the Canadian Rockies. He expects to return to New York in time to attend the Firpo-Wills fight.

Babe Ruth will personally conduct an "All-American Baseball Team Contest," starting Aug. 3, for the Christy Walsh Syndicate, New York.

John Held, Jr., who draws the comic "Oh Margy!" for the United Feature Syndicate, New York, managed an amateur "Follies" performed last week by members of the Weston, Conn., art colony. NINETY PER CENT OF

West Virginia's

PEOPLE ARE NATIVE BORN WHITE

WEST VIRGINIA people, 1,463,701, are almost all native white. The foreign born white population numbers only 61,906, constituting only 4.2 per cent of the total population.

These people have a per capita wealth of $3,040, exceeding the average for the country by $122.

Compare the number of cities, the number of papers, the population of the cities, the circulation of the papers, the wealth per capita and the advertising rates and you can draw your own conclusions.

West Virginia is a hustling state, and the people of this state respond readily to the right merchandising appeal when they see it.

Use these dailies for your publicity and get your share of this West Virginia business.

NEWSPAPER MAKERS AT WORK

B. H. PEACE—He Approves of Young Men

"I FEEL," said B. H. Peace, "like I had stolen a yellow dog."

His interviewer, ready for a drive into the Blue Ridge mountains, for which they were starting, wondered why the editor and publisher of the Greenville (S. C.) News should experience such an emotion.

"It's only 5 o'clock," said Mr. Peace, "and there's still work to be done around the office. Compunctions of conscience never let me feel right when I run away from things like this."

At the age of 50, he has a record of 40 straight years of hard work, 28 of them for other people. As owner of the News his opportunities for leisure are unlimited. Friends who have urged retirement have found their recommendations falling on unsympathetic ears, because B. H. Peace asserts he would much prefer to "labor without pay than to loaf for a fat salary."

Mr. Peace was not blessed—or cursed—with a good start in life. He stepped from a farm to the bottommost rung in a printing office. Years of work brought him ownership of one of the section's largest printing houses; and 8 years ago he was made business manager of the News. Today, he is editor, publisher and owner.

In the 8 years he has managed the paper gross business has increased more than 700 per cent, or about 90 per cent annually.

How?

Not by contests or similar promotional schemes. Not one has been used. Not by lack of competition.

"Chiefly," Mr. Peace said, "by continuously faithful hard work by a majority of men in the organization. Too, because we employ only young men in every department. It has always been our policy when expanding the organization of filling vacancies of any sort to take on men who are coming, and not going. Also, we have tried to produce consistently a newspaper that is several years ahead of the community in which it circulates, and to this end we have put back into the paper each year the greater portion of its earnings. We seem to have succeeded in giving the people what they want.

But Mr. Peace by no means is contented.

"We have never published an edition I was satisfied with," he said. "Considering even the issues I am proudest of, I feel that we might have done better by more careful thought and harder work."

The policy of employing young men does not in the slightest jeopardize the old-timers. One who has been with the paper for decades, for example, is no longer physically able to contribute services in the production of the paper; but his weekly compensation comes in regularly, just as it always did.

And the anxiety of Mr. Peace to do each day's work does not mean that he does not know how to play, and, more important, when to play.

Associated with him in his work are three of his sons, his "right hand" being the eldest, Roger C. Peace, business manager. Charlie is foreign advertising manager and B. H., Junior, yet in his teens, is learning what it is to sweat in the circulation department at $12 a week.

"Work and thrift are the foundation stones of character," Mr. Peace says, "Character is the fruition of habit. It is as impossible to put live, growing timber into a worm-eaten, hollow oak as it is to change a man's habits after he attains the age of 45 or 50. Nature must assert itself here—he must be born again, physically or spiritually. You can patch them up but they are still only a hollow shell."

One of the mottoes he follows, he recommends to his employes:

"It is easier to do things correctly than to do them incorrectly—and a great deal more satisfactory."

Veteran Laments "Good Old Days"

TO EDITOR & PUBLISHER: I'd like to get rid of my grouch by using the EDITOR & PUBLISHER. Useless to tell the young fellows of the standardized machine-made dailies of today that their sheets are not so INTERESTING as they were 30 or 40 years ago.

The man of the household at breakfast or going to work sees on the first page the ordinary sloppy "news." I'll admit some of it is of interest—international, national, state or local. But how is it dished up? Ordinarily, commonplace—no zip to it.

True, most of the stuff isn't worth the money the publishers pay the linotypers to set it—but, still, the stories could be made attractive without impunging upon the truth and fastening them solely upon a "high official" or "rumors."

After looking at the headings or reading the stories on the sports pages (bully for a red-blooded man, even if he be old) what does he find? Lot of junk?—"What My Baby Said," about "How to Get Rid of Pimples and Blackheads," in "Embarrassing Moments," or the rot about "Your Dreams Explained" by men telling "How They Got Their First Jobs!"

Editorials? No influence on the community—local writeups for the masses and classes—the mechanic, motorman, banker.

If you read one paper you read 'em all—for the news. The "slush" stuff is varied. Some of the comics will provoke a laugh, but isn't once a week—Sunday—enough? Financial pages, real estate, certainly, always.

The business office (circulation) may say the women like the silly stuff. Give it to them on Sunday, let them read the advertisements week days. If the ads are written attractively, their interest will be held till it is time for the dear ones to resume their household duties.

There are no "scoops" in the newspapers today—stories which the reporters had to "dig" for and over which the editors would "gloat" when the "loathsome contemporaries" had to refer to them the next day. (And the editor let his reporter put a "tag" in the business office.)

And there's no "punch" in the stuff—all carbon-sheet copy, ground out by the same typewriter, mechanically headed by the copy reader and chuted to the linotype room—just as shoes and matches are manufactured.

IOWA DAILY FEATURES SEMI-PRO. BASEBALL

The Council Bluffs (Ia.) Nonpareil has evolved a plan for covering semi-pro baseball in its section of the state which has become popular with followers of the game. Seventy teams in 7 counties are co-operating with the paper, which devotes a page to their activities.

Contact is maintained with these teams by telephone and weekly letters. Schedules are printed and complete box scores run. Results of individual games are telephoned to the paper; box scores follow by mail. These are printed under a standing head "Southwest Iowa Box Scores," with sub heads "Played Sunday at Corning," etc. Box score blanks are furnished by the sporting department to managers of the teams who act as reporters for the Nonpareil.

A date book as complete as that kept by the city editor is maintained. When a team has an open date it is often filled through the newspaper.

At least once a week a picture of an outstanding southwestern Iowa player appears, while occasionally a three or four-column layout brings out prominent local players. A sports cartoon service fills on days when pictures are not published.

By thus carefully and consistently covering news of the semi-pro field the Nonpareil has gained readers among backers of the various teams. The plan of enlisting the co-operation of the teams has proven far superior to the old haphazard method of covering unorganized baseball. Rivalry between the teams is high and when the annual southwestern Iowa tournament is played the Nonpareil covers the contests in world series style, furnishing the "home towns" with bulletins as well as carrying play-by-play accounts.

C. M. McMillen is in charge of the Nonpareil's semi-pro baseball page.

Rendering Fine Service

July 4, 1924.

TO EDITOR & PUBLISHER: It is due to you from those of us in this country who have received On-to-Britain numbers that acknowledgment should have been made of the very fine service which you have rendered and are rendering this country through your attention to the International Advertising Convention.

I am led to send you this letter because of my unstinted admiration for the On-to-Britain issue of your publication which has just come to hand.

It is an amazingly complete issue so far as it relates to this country, both in its spirit and in its matter. It leaves nothing to be desired, and you and Mr. Ridout, your London Editor, and also Mr. Fitch, deserve the unmeasured thanks of all those who have been recipient of this special issue of yours.

You have invested so much thought, time, money and sympathy in this production that I am sure it will please you to know that your investment is perceived and appreciated, and I am trusting that you have the reward from it desired.

THE HOME OF JOHN ROLFE

Heacham Hall, near Hunstanton, still owned by the Rolfe family, was the home of John (sometimes called Thomas) Rolfe, who crossed over to Virginia early in the 17th century and there married Pocahontas, the Red Indian Chieftainess, who died so tragically on the occasion of her visiting England in 1616, three years after her marriage.

Heacham Hall is easily reached from Norwich, which place is a convenient centre for several such interesting excursions, including Sandringham, the Norfolk home of the Royal family; Bury St. Edmunds, famous for its Abbey ruins; Castleacre, Castle Rising, East Dereham (the burial place of the poet Cowper), and Thetford, which was the chief town of the Anglo-Saxon kingdom of East Anglia.

CURB ON CRIME NEWS BEFORE TRIAL ASKED

Chicago Tribune Backs Plan Editorially and Lawyers Approve—"Trial by Newspaper" Hit—Regulatory Measure Sought

Drastic regulation of publicity given in the newspapers to criminal and civil cases before the actual hearing in court was urged this week in an editorial published in the Chicago Tribune.

The proposal followed the Tribune's abandonment of its suggestion that the trial of Nathan Leopold, Jr., and Richard Loeb for the kidnapping and murder of Robert Franks be broadcast by radio. The Tribune thereupon conducted a referendum among its readers to ascertain their opinion of the broadcasting proposal, and the vote was overwhelmingly against it.

Among those who have indorsed the proposal to curb publicity preceding trials is Russell Whitman, vice-president of the Chicago Bar Association.

"The lawyers are far from blameless," said Mr. Whitman, "but reputable members of the bar deplore the injustice of permitting a trial by newspaper in advance of a hearing by a court and jury. The statements of counsel giving to the press their version of a case and what they are going to prove and do, make it seem incumbent upon opposing counsel to take issue, also in the press, or to allow partisan claims to go unchallenged.

"Where a case promises to be sensational the contest is on. It is most unseemly. Neither party is under any control—a prize fight and no referee. The spectacle is sickening."

"The chief difficulty is likely to arise in drafting a measure which will restrict 'the freedom of the press' only when such freedom operates to obstruct justice. But I believe such a measure can be drawn and enacted."

Andrew R. Sherriff, chairman of the Chicago Bar Association's committee on relations of the press to judicial proceedings, placed squarely upon the shoulders of newspaper editors the responsibility for bringing an end to "trials in the newspapers." No new law is needed for the purpose, he said. He refused to concede that all newspapers must cease the practice before one newspaper dares to deprive its readers of what another furnishes.

VANDERLIP SATISFIED

His Washington Research Bureau Will Not Be Scrapped

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 31.—The Citizens' Research Bureau, the organization established by Frank A. Vanderlip to unearth and tell the real and inside story of the Government and the manner in which it is conducted, will not "go out of business." A current report that the organization, which had been active in furnishing information for the Senate's investigation of the Department of Justice, would disband, has been denied by J. Weston Allen, of Boston, general counsel for the bureau.

The real truth of the situation, Mr. Allen asserted is that a reorganization of the bureau on a permanent basis as a national organization now is nearly completed. In the meantime important country-wide investigations are in progress by the field agents of the bureau.

Since Congress adjourned the reorganization has been under way in accordance with Mr. Vanderlip's plan to make the bureau something more than a one man organization. The former New York banker, who projected the bureau, with the idea that the newspapers were not doing their duty and exposing corruption in high places, had often expressed the opinion that the bureau could be most effective as a cooperative undertaking.

Apparently Mr. Vanderlip is satisfied with the manner in which the bureau has developed and having put Mr. Allen, who was formerly attorney general of Massachusetts at its head, has turned it over to him to go ahead.

THE SERVICE STATION

Questions Concerning the Newspaper and Allied Lines Will Be Answered Here.

Q. Can your statistical department furnish us by return mail with the total daily newspaper circulations and the milline rates for the 20 leading cities of the United States?—B. O.

A. Total circulations and milline rates for the 20 leading cities appear in the Table below. It is based on the March 31 A. B. C. or Post Office Statements of circulation and the minimum rates per agate line now effective on general advertising. The tabulation excludes foreign language and trade and class dailies, being based only on the figures of English language daily and Sunday newspapers of general circulation.

Noteworthy to the general body of EDITOR & PUBLISHER readers, if not of primary interest to our correspondent, is the fact that these 20 cities produce more than half the total circulation of the country's daily press and that their space is still available for advertisers on regular contracts at the ridiculously low rate of $1.89 per line per million circulation, daily, and $1.71 per line Sunday.

The tabulation follows:

WHAT THEY ARE SAYING

EDITORS VS. KINGS

"NO king in olden times exerted so wide an influence as is within the power of the editor of any good newspaper. I tremble to think what would happen to a man hoping to be elected to office if the newspapers should suddenly agree never to print his name. Once in a while, a politician will think that he can silence a newspaper. I never noticed that he has any luck. But a newspaper can silence a politician almost any time."—Lt. Gov. Alvan T. Fuller of Massachusetts.

JOHN WANAMAKER'S ADVERTISING

"WE have organized our advertising bureau much like a newspaper. We consider the things to advertise as the news of the store. We have our reportorial staff, our artists' staff, and our print shop which sets up the advertising. In consultation with the merchandising office, the space is laid out several days ahead. Then the news is gathered through the store. We do not allow any one to write an advertisement without seeing the merchandise. We insist also that the "reporter" see the buyer in charge of the merchandise and get information at first-hand. The news is then written in human-interest form and given to our managing editor for his approval. It is then set in type and made up as a unit in the newspaper."—Joseph H. Appel, Advertising Director, John Wanamaker's.

COUNTRY MERCHANT SHOULD USE WEEKLIES

"THERE is one form of advertising very much in vogue in some sections that I personally do not approve of, especially for the country merchant, and that is bill board advertising. There are several reasons why we object to this form of advertising. It is expensive for the number of people it reaches; it gets stale for want of frequent change of copy; they become repulsive and often detract from the attractiveness of the surrounding section; in our section, they make ideal targets for rifle and shotgun practice, especially the roadside signs. I believe the money spent on billboard advertising by local and foreign advertisers, if used through the country weekly papers, would accomplish a greater result."—M. E. Darsey, Advertising Manager, George E. Darsey & Co., before Texas Press Association.

SERVICE REAPS NATIONAL ACCOUNTS

"NEWSPAPER advertising is still in its embryo stage. The past 15 years has probably witnessed a greater advance in newspaper advertising merchandising methods than took place during the entire 265 years of initial development—but even that, much remains yet to be learned and done. Where formerly newspaper advertising was largely a community affair, it has now attained national and international proportions. The successful newspaper of today not only carries the commercial messages of local merchants, but of national manufacturers and institutions, as well. The big problem with most newspapers today—especially in the smaller towns— is how to secure a profitable share of national advertising business. The answer lies in one word: 'Service'—service to the advertising manufacturer and to his advertising agency representatives."—C. C. Younggreen, Vice-President, Klauman Pieterson-Dunlap-Younggreen.

Good Copy Is the Secret

Investigation among Presbyterian churches indicates that very seldom does a specific advertising campaign of local church fail to bring into the church treasury more money than the advertisements cost, to say nothing of the increased attendance.

But in no case has this result come about when the advertisement carried merely the topic of the sermon and the name of the church.

Better advertising on behalf of all the churches in town is possible—and profitable, if the paper wishes it to be. Copy for such joint advertising may be had without charge from E. H. Harris, The Palladium, Richmond, Indiana.

K. C. STAR ADDS COLOR SECTION AND COMICS

New Sunday Supplements Being Printed on Specially Constructed Press— Marks Radical Change in Daily's Policy

The Kansas City Star which heretofore has never used color or comic strips, on Sunday, July 27, added an 8-page comic section and a magazine section in colors. The new sections, which will be a weekly feature of the newspaper, are being printed on a specially constructed Goss press. Experiments in the four color process being used were made at the Star plant.

The Star management claims that no other newspaper as yet has been able to print in four colors a magazine on a rotary press with the quality of paper it is using. In a front page story announcing the innovation, attention is called to the fact that the Star is pioneering in a new field of journalism.

To prepare for the improved Sunday newspaper, the Star was forced to build an addition to its plant, 3 stores and basement being added.

Among the outstanding features of the new edition are:

A page reproduction in four colors of a notable work of art; fiction illustrated in color; a double page in color of fashion pictures from Paris; stories of conspicuously successful lives; a double page of pictures in the wake of the news.

The Star has expended considerable capital and much time in preparing for the new venture.

Among the comics are "Gasoline Alley" by King; "Mr. and Mrs.," by Briggs; "The Man in the Brown Derby," by Webster; "Smitty," by Bernd; "Home, Sweet Home," by Tuthill; "Hairbreadth Harry," by Kahles; "Reg'lar Fellers," by Byrnes; "Winnie Winkle," by Branner.

Many a newspaper pads its "advertising records" with all sorts of trade space. They never would get a line of such advertising if they sold for cash only.

It seems fair—but how about the cash advertiser who comes into competition with the trade advertiser? What does he get?

Well, he gets a piece of the neck.

Our Own World of Letters

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

E. P. (commonly spoken of as Editorial Page) Mitchell, for many years editor of the New York Sun, has a delightful chat about himself in Scribner's Magazine for July. But the matter to which I wish to call attention is the article which he will contribute to the August issue on the subject "A Newspaper Man's Newspaper"—a phrase that used to be applied to the New York Sun when it was edited by Charles Anderson Dana. Eugene Field was said to have been discovered by Dana, and hence it is especially appropriate that the second installment of these reminiscences by Mr. Mitchell should contain several of Field's cryptic notes.

THE newspaper man found in the fiction pages of the magazine is doubtless a well-known character to lay readers, but he will seldom, if ever, be recognized by members of the working press. Henry Justin Smith, who for so many years has been news editor of the Chicago Daily News, has created a real journalist in "Josslyn" (Covici-McGee).

I have no desire to review this book to such a length that a perusal of the volume is not necessary. I simply make one quotation to show that Josslyn walks out of the city room straight into the pages of a novel:

> He was sent to get "statements" from shrewd landlords whose tenements had just burned down, costing a few trifling lives, women or children; and he had to be polite to these monsters, and write down their lies, and see them printed.
> There were inquests; farcical affairs, wherein venal and sleepy deputy coroners ordered favorable verdicts from the tramps they had sworn in.
> Once he sat in a police station, while Blake coolly sketched an enormous brazen woman, pock-marked, grossly dressed, who had smothered her baby and buried it in an ash-pile; and Josslyn had to write down and "dress up" her remarks
>
> He was sent to a railroad wreck; he waded in blood and groped among slithery bundles of clothes for scraps of paper giving identification.
>
> He helped cover a bank failure, fought his way to the door through a shawled mob of screaming women, found the banker calmly smoking, wrote down the banker's lies; that afternoon he had to interview a gaudily-clad woman with whom it was said the banker was "in love"; and the woman tried to kiss Josslyn. . . .
>
> Some days he viewed corpses; some days he said "yes, sir" to bland hypocrites; some he spent copying illiterate diaries, full of "my baby girl" and "the oooooooooos stand for kisses."
> He worked never less than nine hours a day, and sometimes thirteen. He was one of the men they told off to sit up with juries, and to wait for strike settlements. There were weeks when he did nothing but wait: Wait in the offices, or in a jury-room, among obscene lawyers and the pale faces of the prisoners' relatives, watching a certain oaken door.
>
> They said among the staff, with chuckles: "Josslyn's getting his."
>
> Occasionally someone accosted him in the hall with: "How's the poetry now, Josslyn?"
>
> And at home Blake would perhaps greet him: "Well, still believe God's in his heaven,—huh?"

NOW that I have started quoting from the book I am going to be like Rip Van Winkle and not count this one:

> "Of course," said Franklin calmly, "this place is a fearful dog-hole. The newspaper business is a muddled, frantic hell of a business where you never know from one day to the next how you stand or what'll happen; and you roll up your sleeves every morning and fight the world, and you half poison yourself with mean thoughts, and you scrap with the Old Man—well, I oughtn't to say any more about it; but what do you say? Do you insist on staying in the business?"
> "Yes," stammered Josslyn.

In my review of "Deadlines," in which Mr. Smith gives the quaint, the amusing, the tragic memoirs of the news-rooms, I think I pointed out that Josslyn was an incorrigible idealist. In this second book where he is the leading character he passes through a bitter disillusionment, but comes again into his own in the concluding chapters. One cannot get away from the feeling that Josslyn is a real character in Chicago newspaper circles. I doubt whether Mr. Smith himself will deny such an assertion.

Judged by the highest literary standards of modern realism "Josslyn" is a newspaper classic. Fictional in form, it is in reality a series of snapshots of newspaper life; it comes much nearer giving a true picture of present-day press conditions than "Success" by Samuel Hopkins Adams. (Houghton Mifflin Company).

UNTIL Henry Ford purchased the Dearborn Independent in November, 1918, it was a small country weekly. According to an item in Time, the weekly news magazine, for July 28, Ford has made this sheet a national periodical with a circulation over 700,000, the bulk of which was obtained by Ford agents on a liberal commission. The same item says that Ford is erecting in Dearborn a building to cost nearly a million and a half. It is to be equipped with presses able to turn out an edition of one million copies of the Dearborn Independent each week. The item calls attention to the fact that the Independent—unlike most of Ford's other ventures—has not paid expenses, but it attributes this deficit to a policy of not accepting advertising.

SOME day the straight reporter is going to come into his own. A step in that direction will be found in the concluding paragraph of a letter which Felix Frankfurter of Cambridge, Mass., publishes in The Nation for July 30, under the caption "Snappy Journalism." The paragraph in this letter about the way the Democratic Convention was reported under which I should like to put ditto marks follows:

> Of course the Garden convention afforded endless material for the mere fun-maker and wit—for an Artemus Ward or a Swift. That's why among all the "special" writers Will Rogers carried off the laurels. He was plainly and completely out for fun and sauciness; he didn't pretend to interpret the news or to stick his pen below the surface to reality. But when it comes to the historians of the convention, the real news and insight for present-day readers and for future historians will be found in the unpretentious work of the dray horses of journalism, the daily chroniclers of daily happenings—stupid, slow, confused, struggling events—men like Michelson of the New York World and Oulihan of the New York Times.

OCTOBER 6, has been set by Simon and Schuster, Inc., as the publication date of "Joseph Pulitzer, His Life and Letters" by Don C. Seitz. Originally a two volume work was planned, one of which was to be written by Mr. Seitz and the other by Frank I. Cobb, for many years the editor of the World, after the death of Joseph Pulitzer in 1911. The death of Mr. Cobb last January, however, caused such a change in original plans that Mr. Seitz has done all of the work for the biography, which will consist of one large volume, fully illustrated and generously documented.

Incidentally, it may be remarked that Mr. Seitz has been engaged in the collection of material for this biography for something like 12 years. In 1898 he became the business manager of the World; before that time he had been the Albany correspondent of the Brooklyn Eagle, and later city editor of the same paper. At one time he was the assistant publisher of the New York Recorder.

Those who have seen the manuscript of the book say that it strikes many of the human interest notes found in the volume of "The Life and Letters of Walter Hines Page," and that it has the same dramatic interest as the autobiography of Edward Bok.

The mention of "The Life and Letters of Joseph Pulitzer" reminds me that the State Company of Columbia, S. C., has just published a volume of some 500 pages on "Braxton Bragg—General of the Confederacy" also by Seitz. In this volume, he has aimed neither to defend nor to vindicate. His purpose has been to give the facts about a Confederate general who fought some of the fiercest battles in the war between the States. It will always be a mystery to the friends of Mr. Seitz to know how a man who held the position of business manager of the New York World could find so much time to do the tremendous amount of research work required for the preparation of this volume.

Mr. Seitz has to his credit several volumes of poems, most of which appeared previously on the editorial page of the World. In recognition of his literary efforts he was elected president of the Author's Club of New York.

A BOOKLET that will answer many questions about the chemistry of paper-making is "Technical Control of the Paper-Making Process" by Ernst Mahler, General Superintendent of the Kimberly-Clark Company, Neenah, Wis. Strictly speaking, the booklet does not bear the title I have mentioned, but it does contain an article with that caption. It is profusely illustrated in rotogravure from photographs showing the story of paper from wood pulp to news print.

BUSINESS TICKLER

THIS is "Do it!" week.

Do the things you have been saying you proposed to do for an entire year.

On your desk, in your letter file, on your 1924-23 calendar, and tucked away in the corners of your brain are the memorandum notes to guide you in this week's ideal clean-up campaign.

You said that "some day" you would take that hard boiled merchant to lunch at the club and play him a round of golf and get into his mind the fact that he is missing an opportunity to better his condition through the medium of your newspaper. This week you will DO it!

This week write that long-deferred letter!

This week hold that staff meeting and say that thing which, if transferred from your mind to the minds of your co-laborers will mean a reform in methods and a united front for the business you are entitled to.

Make something really useful of this week—this mid-summer week, this ordinarily dull and uninteresting and unprofitable week!

This is a grand and glorious week, because it is not so full of pressing duties that it gives no time for abstract thinking and a tickling of those collateral and often neglected subjects which, when cultivated, may bring major results.

The gods have given you this week for high purposes—use it! Do it NOW!

BUT few women understand the plans of a house as depicted in blueprints. But photographs are different—any woman can understand them. If the contractors would use more interior pictures of the built-in features of modern houses to illustrate their ads they would no doubt find it a paying proposition. Suggest this idea to the advertising contractors of your paper, and you'll make money by doing it and so will they.—B. F. Clark, Hutchinson, Kan.

"Do You Know Where to Buy Nationally Advertised Goods?"—Make it a contest feature. Papers can make the amount of prizes to be given according to local conditions. Lay out the page or double page and pack in an equal number of spaces. In each of these the names and addresses of various merchants will be inserted—the other half will contain merely the trade names and slogan of nationally advertised goods. The object is to place the name and the slogan over the name of the merchant handling the goods. George C. Marcley, Ogdensburg (N. Y.) Republican-Journal.

Have you considered that the charitable organizations of your cities have a problem—that of raising funds—which demands their use of paid space? A number of newspapers have built up considerable departments by once or twice a week having special sections devoted to fairly small "ads" of such institutions, explaining their needs, and asking contributions—and asking for money to be willed them. Usually a special, low rate is offered. A paper with a high-class clientele in particular has a worthwhile proposition to offer this type of advertiser.—James M. Mosely, Boston.

By using some fast telephone solicitors, one large Sunday newspaper recently obtained a large lineage of small tie-up ads of about two inches each, with trademark and name of local dealer, from dealers over a wide territory who sell cars being advertised. It boosted the total lineage.—J. M.

A western newspaper originated a new one. "Free Cab Service to These Stores." Five merchants arranged with local taxicab company. The stores refunded the fare charged if purchases made amounted to over $10.00. A full-page advertisement was used to spread the message. A live ad man could easily convince a live merchant the merits of this scheme. —George C. Marcley, Ogdensburg (N. Y.) Republican-Journal.

Here's a stunt that will help you get more radio advertising: Name a certain week as "Long Distance Radio Week," during which all local radio fans would try for the longest distances possible. Ask all fans getting distant points to write in and tell you what they've done. Use this material in the radio department. And use the week as the excuse for getting more advertising from local radio dealers.—Frank H. Williams, Santa Ana, Cal.

"Sales Brevities" was the title of a small box in the Dubuque (Ia.) Times-Journal by the Roshek Bros. Company, included in a regular half-page ad. The ad featured a special column of items that required little elaboration to establish them as extra bargains.—L. J. Jellison, Dubuque (Ia.) Times-Journal.

About this time o' year you can get the coal dealers in your town to do some advertising telling the people "to buy their coal early when they can get the best in quality, price, etc." The coal season doesn't start before October, but this is a good time to buy. Try making a layout or two, with headlines, and you can get the coal dealers to buy the space. Maybe a page of dealers all together!—R. John Gibler, St. Louis, Mo.

Grouping many business cards, the Washington (D. C.) Daily News lists various local enterprises under the title "Buyers' Guide of Recognized Products and Services." In a very short time many new cards have joined this growing list.—C. M. Littlejohn, Washington, D. C.

"Clean Soft Water at the Turn of a Faucet Always" is the heading used by the Fort Wayne (Ind.) Journal-Gazette over a group of ads of local plumbers offering water softeners and household water systems. This group of ads ran about three-fourths of a page.—F. H. Williams, Fort Wayne, Ind.

In one city its three laundries co-operate in advertising. Each Monday, Wednesday and Friday a joint advertisement is published giving one new reason or benefit for sending your washing to the laundry.—Robert B. Miller, Marion, Ind.

SCHAEFER'S IDEA WON

Launched Movement to Have A.A.C.W. Declare Against War

A. Schaefer, advertising manager of the Fort Wayne (Ind.) Journal-Gazette and president of the Morning Newspaper Publishers' Association is credited with originating the movement which enlisted the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World in the cause of world peace resulting in the adoption of a pledge at the Wembley convention last week to "endeavor to awaken a more intense public sentiment against all those insidious movements that have a tendency to arouse war passions."

Nine months ago during the Bok Peace Plan contest he conceived the idea of taking the question of peace before the A. A. C. W. at the Wembley meet. He telegraphed the briefest possible outline of his plan to Edward W. Bok and later developed his proposal and sent it to the Bok award committee indicating he was not entering into competition for the Bok prize of $100,000. Since his proposal did not conform to the conditions of that competition. He merely believed that a great agency for peace would be procured if the A. A. C. W. could be enlisted in the cause.

Mr. Schaefer's proposal was printed in the Sunday Journal-Gazette, June 27.

Huge Iowa Special Edition

The Davenport (Ia.) Democrat's 240-page New Home edition published July 20, celebrating occupancy of its new plant is thought to have been the largest edition ever published in the state. More than 12 tons of paper were used. The mail edition filled 864 sacks. A 48-page section was devoted to the history of the Democrat, which is in its 69th year. Frank D. Throop is publisher.

VIRGINIA PRESS ADDS 12 NEW MEMBERS

Scarborough Reelected President at Thirty-sixth Annual Convention, Roanoke—George Marble, N. E. A. Head, Addresses Meet

Election of twelve new members, bringing the total membership to 122; the re-election of Paul Scarborough, editor of the Franklin (Va.) Tidewater News, as president, and J. C. Latimer, Richmond Times Dispatch, as secretary-treasurer, and addresses by George R. Koester, the Greenville (S. C.) Piedmont, and George W. Marble, president of the National Editorial Association, featured the 36th annual convention of the Virginia Press Association held at Roanoke, Va., July 25-26. Saturday was spent in touring the resort section of Southwest Virginia. A banquet Saturday night closed the entertainment features.

PAUL SCARBOROUGH

President Marble of the N. E. A. spoke at a dinner given Thursday evening at Blue Ridge Springs. He belittled the prejudices which exist where there are rival newspapers and said it was time the newspapers were realizing the great moral obligation resting upon them.

Mr. Koester in his talk on "Box Office vs. Sanctum," said there was need for the newspaper publisher to have a vision, adding, "A paper can have as distinct a personality as an individual. A paper without personality invites and succumbs to competition with personality."

Dr. Joseph H. Smith, president of the Virginia State Chamber of Commerce, outlined the "five-five" plan of that organization, and Dr. J. A. C. Chandler, president of the College of William and Mary, spoke on the relationship of the press and the educational institutions.

John H. Gwathmey, editor of the Ashland Herald Progress, spoke on "Virginia's Need," stressing the necessity of advertising rates being based on a knowledge of the cost of production. He said the reason more country publishers were not present at the meeting was that they carry advertising at such a low rate they could not afford the time or money to attend the meeting.

District chairmen were elected as follows: First District, John W. Daniel, Cape Charles; second, S. L. Slover, Norfolk; third, John H. Gwathmey, Ashland; fourth, George Kilpatrick, Lawrenceville; fifth, E. G. Moseley, Danville; sixth, L. E. Lookabill, Roanoke; seventh, J. H. Lindsay, Charlottesville; eighth, Stilson H. Hall, Leesburg; ninth, J. A. Whitman, Wytheville; tenth, George O. Green, Clifton Forge.

President Paul Scarborough in his annual address urged the editors to get away from the habit of catering to the politicians and to dissect every candidate and "impale his carcass under the microscope of cold reason and common sense." In commenting upon press agents, he asked, "When will we learn to distinguish between the actual news item and the more or less cleverly disguised press agent dope which is always sent as 'being of unusual interest to your readers.' It is worth mentioning that the United States Government is one of the most flagrant 'space grafters,' although the varieties of free publicity matter which reach your desk have long since exceeded the 57 pickle fame, or even the number of ballots cast in the recent Democratic convention."

Hood to St. Louis

Kenneth W. Hood of Portland, Ore., former secretary of the Tacoma (Wash.) Advertising Club and of the Pacific Coast Advertising Clubs' Association, will assume his new duties as advertising manager of the merchandise division of the Better Business Bureau of the St. Louis Advertising Club, August 10. He will install a shopping service employing the services of expert shoppers to reflect the reactions and impressions of the buying public in visiting St. Louis stores. Charles H. Fehrman, assistant to Charles W. Riehl, manager of the Better Business Bureau, will become manager of the financial division.

FREE PUBLICITY SCORED

Northeast Missouri Press Condemns Press Agents at Paris Meet

The Northeast Missouri Press Association, at its mid-summer meeting at Paris, July 25, ran up the black flag against free publicity agents and bureaus, which seem to pop up like toadstools during campaign years. The action was made plain in a resolution offered by Tom V. Bodine, editor of the Paris Mercury, following his talk on "Newspapers' Support of Candidates for Office," which was unanimously adopted by the convention.

The resolution included a recommendation "in the interest of popular government that a less expensive and more representative method of nominating candidates be devised than the present state primary system."

Bodine, who runs a weekly paper in a town of 2,000, said he saved up all the free publicity matter that came to his office in six weeks, and that it weighed 11 pounds.

Charles F. Link, who runs a large commercial printing plant at Kirksville, and also publishes a weekly, in speaking of "The Famine in Apprentices," said that in many offices the work rooms were poorly lighted and unhealthy, and facilities lacking. He urged that the mechanical department be maintained in better shape, with plenty of room in which to work and good light. Representatives from 21 counties were present at the Paris meeting.

Inexperience Wins Ad Prize

Miss C. Ethel Craddock, a Brooklyn woman with less than 6 months advertising experience won the $100 prize offered by Harper & Brothers for the best advertisement of "Advertising Copy," a book by Prof. George Burton Hotchkiss chairman of the department of advertising and marketing, New York University. Nearly 300 ad men, many well known, submitted copy. Judges were Earnest Elmo Calkins, senior partner of Calkins & Holden; Bruce Barton president of Barton, Durstine, & Osborn; and F. R. Feland, who is connected with the George Batten Company

Bean Growers to Advertise

An $80,000 advertising campaign to acquaint the public with the food value of Michigan pea beans is being planned by the Michigan Bean Growers' Association A. B. Cook, president of the group, states that Michigan will produce about 50 per cent of the total crop this year. G. C. Marotzke of Sebewaring is chairman of the advertising committee.

HOW many people have dropped a letter in the box, perhaps written in haste and uttering statements which are afterwards regretted, or, perhaps, you have put the wrong letter in an envelope directed to an entirely different person? The Providence Journal sent a reporter to interview the local postmasters and letter carriers and he came back with some tales which made the readers roar with laughter. The story was illustrated with comic cartoons which enriched the story.—Russell H. Sharpe, Providence, R. I.

When children under 16 get into trouble, don't use their names, but say "A boy whose name is withheld by the News because of his age." This gives the kid a chance, makes friends of the parents and friends of the child and makes the people realize the paper is human.—Harold Keats, Washington (D. C.) News.

One newspaper man of the northwest has established a reputation for his predictions on the amounts of the yield of the growing grains by taking trips through the grain-growing districts and interviewing farmers. The Pharos-Tribune used this idea and selected representative farmers in all parts of the county and interviewing them on the crops over the telephone. Very good stories resulted.—Lewis Hyman, Logansport (Ind.) Pharos-Tribune.

The "support docket," auxiliary to the divorce court, holds an interesting feature for the court reported. The Fort Wayne News-Sentinel recently ran an interesting story from this source, telling that the "support docket" revealed that more than $5,000 a month was being paid by divorced fathers for the support of their children, whom, by the way, they might only see on stated intervals. Seven hundred and fifty men paid $63,458 during the last year for children's support. The story handled in the human interest style gave opportunity to make comment on the growing "divorce evil" with comment from judges and their opinions as to legal "preventatives" and "remedies" for the constantly increasing number of unhappy marriages.—R. L. Beard, Fort Wayne News-Sentinel.

In their issue of July 3, the Queens County News carried a word-for-word copy of the Fourth of July program of Jamaica Village of 1842. In the same story the program for 1924 was used, making quite a contrast. It may not be too early to hunt up old Labor Day, Thanksgiving, Christmas or New Year celebration programs. Coupled with an outline of the activities planned for this year, the stuff makes live copy.—R. C. Bolton, Jr., New York City.

This year there will be a large number of postoffice employes retiring on pension throughout the entire country. Each of these are subjects for stories which are both entertaining and instructive. If the postal employe retiring is a mail-distributing clerk, ascertain how many letters he distributes each day. If the employe retiring is a carrier, figure out how many miles he has averaged a day and the total mileage for his term of service.—George Smedal, Sioux City, Iowa.

A paper can make friends of the Boy Scouts in its city by printing each week, preferably in box form, the best "Good Turn" performed by a scout during the week. Each week there is some outstanding example of service a scout has given. By giving this proper recognition, it will encourage the boys in their efforts to live up to the scout creed and will also prove valuable as a news source, since scouts frequently come across live items of news which they will report to the paper they consider their best friend.—A. C. Regli, Eau Claire, Wis.

In early days, women made beautiful hooked rugs at home by hand. This has again become the nation-wide vogue. Be on the watch for a feature story with pictures, all about it, how to hook rugs, how to decorate homes with them, and designs made by modern adepts.—James M. Mosely, Boston.

Pet superstitions are fascinating to a great many persons and can be developed into lively Sunday features. It is surprising to know the large number of educated persons who remain fearful of the number 13, walking under a ladder, three lights from one match, black cats and what not. Practically all persons, whether they admit it or not, have something of which they are unexplainably superstitious. City dwellers are more susceptible to superstitions than others. An article on the whys and wherefores is good any time.—A. C. Regli, Eau Claire, Wis.

What are the qualifications for voters in your state? Many eligible voters stay away from the polls both at the primaries and the general election because they have recently moved and don't know whether they are qualified to vote or not. Others travel and may be in doubt about their right to vote and the method of voting by mail when away. Few take the trouble to inquire.—W. W. Garver, Cleveland (O.) Times.

The Bridgeport (Conn.) Telegram has adopted a plan to get papers to morning readers more speedily than by newsboys. WHAT OUR READERS SAY

Rankin Speech Questioned

To Editor & Publisher: I have before me the text of the splendid address, "Newspapers, the National and International Medium," delivered by William H. Rankin before the International Convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World at Wembley, England.

There is so much good newspaper promotion in this document that I hesitate to mention the one flaw that caused me to wince when I read it. But at the risk of being called an old grandmother, I am going to pass my criticism along for what it may be worth.

In speaking about a plan to blanket the country with an advertising campaign for India tea, Mr. Rankin uses the sentence: "Also from time to time splendid editorials are contributed by newspapers on the nutritious, wholesome and healthful stimulating qualities of tea." He is referring to publicity that would appear in newspapers handling the India tea advertising account.

During the last two years I have received with increasing frequency letters sent along to me from the advertising manager, business manager, or publisher, with the suggestion that I could use the material as news or as a feature, if my judgment warranted such use. These letters that I refer to were diplomatically worded and clever appeals from the merchandizing heads of big advertising agencies, asking for editorial support, feature space, or news space that was tied up with some advertising campaign.

Even granting that there is occasional news value in such material, I submit that the news department must draw a sharp line between news that is published as news and material offered by an advertising agency which hopes that the lust for more advertising lineage and the maintenance of friendly relations with the advertising agencies is such that good news judgment will be over-ridden and the papers made increasingly subject to promotion material.

Some of the biggest advertising agencies in the country are the greatest offenders along this line at the present time. I think such inroads constitute a menace to the editorial department and I believe we should fight to eliminate such appeals at the source.

Let the advertising agencies confine their submission of news, features and editorial subjects to the editorial department, and not send them through the advertising or business managers who are always business office trained, and in many cases without the sharp perception of news and propaganda values that the editorial department has. Sincerely,

Walter M. Harrison,
Managing Editor, Oklahoma City Oklahoman and Times.

New York State

and Her Achievements

New York is a liberal and progressive leader among the States of the Union, that has been built upon solid foundations for a better citizenship and business stability.

New York is the most favored of all States because of the right of might as represented in her population of more than 10,384,144 within what is probably the richest State area in the United States.

Rich in natural resources in the beginning, New York has kept her place of first by industrial expansion and intensive farming.

Communication and transportation have been developed to a higher point of perfection in New York State than in any other commonwealth of the nation. Her waterways have been made modern bearers of commerce and the business life of the entire State is closely interlocked by steam railroads, electric railroads and highways that mark the last word in Twentieth Century transportation construction.

Because of her position as a world leader, New York has attracted to herself the leaders and doers of big things from every part of the world, with the result that her citizenship is the most powerful buying force, as well as the most discriminating, today, anywhere. This explains why New York State is the most sought after market in the world.

Tell your story in this list of daily New York newspapers and you blanket the State. They can sell your merchandise through the local merchant.

THE DOMINANT NEWSPAPER IN ROCHESTER

SIX years ago the Rochester Times-Union arose from the consolidation of two weak newspapers. Today it dominates its field. With a subscription price fifty percent higher than that of any other Rochester paper, its steady gain in circulation as well as in advertising and prestige continues.

Frank E. Gannett, editor and publisher of The Times-Union, writes:

"Without any question the Consolidated Press day leased wire service has been a big factor in building up The Times-Union to its dominating position. The service for our sporting department and the Chicago Daily News cables are of great value to us. Our financial pages are recognized as the best in the field and have won for The Times-Union the support of the men of most influence in Rochester. The superiority of its financial service is being appreciated by stock and bond houses, for its financial advertising has nearly doubled since this service was added."

Advertising Under Test Conditions in Chicago

Advertising is made profitable to an unusual degree in Chicago by The Chicago Daily News, which offers the advertiser opportunity of conducting his campaign under circumstances approximating "laboratory conditions."

His advertising expenditure is concentrated almost wholly upon his immediate market—the area necessarily cultivated by his salesforce as a unit. The 94% concentration of The Daily News circulation in Chicago and suburbs assures that.

He thoroughly covers the "advertisers' market"—the great majority of financially competent citizens of Chicago. This is assured by the 400,000 circulation of The Chicago Daily News, and its reading in nearly every worth while home in Chicago by the various members of the family.

His advertising is placed side by side with the bulk of the advertising of local merchants in the medium to which the buying public of Chicago habitually looks for merchandise news that is essentially complete.

The total capital investment in industry in the State of Ohio is nearly $4,000,000,000 and the payroll of industry within the state annually totals more than $1,218,000,000.

The industrial horsepower center of the nation is located in the northeastern part of the state. Into every county radiates the industrial strength that has placed the commonwealth among the four leaders of the nation in the amount of excess profit taxes paid into the Federal Treasury.

The iron and steel ore and reduction and machinery industries are the leaders in the state. Manufacturing is very extensive in other lines. Of 264 industries classified by the Federal Census, Ohio is represented in all but 46. In eighteen of these industries Ohio outranks all other states and is second in iron and steel products.

Ohio is purely American in her ideals and mode of living as well as in the high percentage of her citizens who are native born and of native parentage. Illiteracy is low at 2.8 per cent.

Have you ever seen this chap before?

MR. MICAWBER

He's the original of the manufacturer and business man whom you know that is always "waiting for something to turn up."

You will remember Charles Dickens in David Copperfield mentions this chap whom he named "Mr. Micawber."

If Mr. Micawber were living today and were in business he would be making excuses for his lack of aggressiveness by saying some things like this:

"We hope to do good business after the election is over."

"Things will liven up a bit when the weather isn't so hot (or cold)."

"Business will be better if foreign affairs become settled."

Meanwhile alert business men are up and doing. Their products are being aggressively advertised and they are putting money in the bank.

In Philadelphia and suburbs there are more than three million people who are daily buying food, clothing, shoes, supplies of all kinds,—their daily needs are being filled by the advertisers who are going to them while their competitors are "waiting for something to turn up."

Editor & Publisher Investigation Shows "Space in Air" Is Commercially Sold for General Publicity Advertising—Companies Use Big News But Claim They Are Not Newspaper Rivals—How the Wireless Reporter Works

By WARREN BASSETT

REPORTING big news events by radio—how is it done and what effect does it have upon the newspapers?

To answer this question I interviewed officials of two of the largest radio broadcasting stations in the country this week—WEAF operated by the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, and WJZ, controlled by the Radio Corporation of America, both located in New York.

As the interviews progressed I learned that more and more the business of radio broadcasting is paralleling the business of gathering and disseminating news. Space on the air is considered much in the same way as newspaper white space. It is the duty of the radio program manager to fill the immeasureable columns of the ether with information and entertainment which will "hold" listeners just as the news editor fills the news columns.

Discovering "what the public wants" is the problem of program officials just as it is the problem of newspaper editors.

Radio program features are "edited" in the light of their entertainment value to insure variety and appeal.

Radio broadcasting stations compete for listeners just as newspapers compete for readers.

An assignment book is kept in which news events of wide importance are listed for broadcasting. When the opening gong clangs in the prizefight arena, when a foreign polo team enters play with the Americans, or when a World's Series begins, a "radio reporter" is present to dictate into the microphone a running story of the event.

And advertising, the backbone of the newspaper business, is not being neglected. "Space on the air" is being sold at the rate of $200 for 10 minutes by the American Telephone and Telegraph Company. A group of 4 salesmen is at work interesting firms in this form of advertising. To date more than 250 companies have purchased and used this radio advertising, which differs radically from other recognized forms.

Is this close similarity between broadcasting and newspapers a menace to the future of journalism?

Radio officials say not.

The daily broadcasting of national and international news—the same news which goes into the dailies of the country—is virtually impossible. The press associations, defending their property rights in news, have refused the radio companies permission to broadcast any story carried in their reports. Individual newspapers, by terms of their contracts with the press services, cannot furnish this news. Because of this situation only an infinitesimal portion of the news carried by daily papers of the country finds its way into the air via radio.

In New York WJZ broadcasts nightly a short summary of local news prepared by the New York Evening Post. Both WEAF and WJZ carry a daily farm produce report obtained from the New York Bureau of Farms and Markets. WJZ broadcasts daily, by permission of the New York Stock Exchange, a limited financial report carrying the quotations of 60 stocks. This list is prepared by a local firm of brokers. In addition a daily summary of Wall Street written especially for WJZ by the Wall Street Journal is put on the air.

J. ANDREW WHITE,
Radio reporter at work at the Yankee Stadium

Refusal of the press associations to release their reports for broadcasting has limited the news field of the radio to the isolated "big" news events—speeches by the President—the national conventions—sports contests in which there is sectional or national interest, and occasional big news flashes, like the death of the President's son, which get into the air without prearrangement.

How do the radio companies cover these fixed events?

It takes enterprise, skill, and ingenuity. Competition for the right to broadcast is keen. In New York and the East the race is usually between the American Telephone and Telegraph Company and the Radio Corporation of America because of the mechanical features involved. To broadcast a prizefight, a baseball or football game, a microphone must be placed at the arena or field. Wire connections must be made between the scene of the contest and the broadcasting station itself. Few companies have the mechanical facilities for handling these "remote control" events, as they are called.

The right to broadcast is obtained from officials in charge of the event under consideration. If it is a prizefight the promoter is consulted. Permission to broadcast the World's Series is obtained from owners of the participating teams and approved by Judge Kenesaw M. Landis. The National Republican and Democratic Committees decided what companies should broadcast the recent conventions. Graduate managers of college football teams are consulted for permission to broadcast important games.

Neither WEAF nor WJZ pay for the right to place an event on the air.

"Competition never reaches that point," officials declared. "As it is, whichever company wins must stand a loss. We could hardly pay for that privilege."

In the case of the Republican and Democratic conventions, however, the A. T. & T. received pay from the stations in other cities which were hooked up by wire and received the radio report in their own plants for broadcasting.

When permission to broadcast has been obtained, the necessary mechanical arrangements are made. It is now that the "radio reporter" steps into the lime-light. Seated at the microphone at the scene of action he dictates his running story for the thousands of listeners. It is a difficult art.

The men chosen for the task of "covering" an event by radio are selected for their special ability to report tersely and accurately what is occurring.

J. Andrew White, WJZ's veteran "radio reporter" is a former New York newspaper man. He started on the New York Herald in 1907 as a reporter and subsequently worked on the old New York Press and the World. For a time he was New York correspondent for the London Times. For 10 years he edited Wireless Age and at the present time owns a weekly near Tuckahoe, N. Y., the Eastchester Citizen-Bulletin.

White declares it would be impossible for him to report by radio without his newspaper training.

"News judgment is absolutely necessary to radio reporting," he declares. "You must pick the news and get it on the air instantaneously. You can't be a second late. The listeners hear the crowd cheering when a decisive blow is struck. Your report of that blow must coincide. The newspaper reporter has time to weigh and select his phrases—to cross out, rearrange and correct. But with radio you must put the event into words at the time it occurs."

Graham McNamee, announcer for WEAF who has covered several sport events for his station is not a newspaper man. He usually works with an "observer"—a trained newspaper reporter. Because of the voice qualities necessary for good broadcasting, the average news writer is not adapted to reporting by radio, although he be able to dictate a smooth, unbroken story, radio officials say.

To understand the competition between radio companies for the right to broadcast news it is necessary to know the agreement which exists between the American Telephone and Telegraph Company and the Radio Corporation of America. Each company holds exclusive patents on devices needed by the other to broadcast successfully. Generally speaking A. T. & T. devices are principally in the field of broadcasting; Radio Corporation patents are in the field of receiving. In return for the right to use the A. T. & T. broadcasting patents other companies have agreed not to enter the field of commercial broadcasting, that is, broadcasting for pay.

Immediately this agreement became effective the race for listeners began. By arranging distinctive programs the A. T. & T. aimed to attract a wide circle of "fans," thus making advertising space on the air of high value. Like a newspaper, the larger their "circulation" the more they could charge for advertising. In addition, daily broadcasting popularized radio and created a demand for broadcasting apparatus, which the A. T. & T. has for sale.

The Radio Corporation of America, whose chief patents cover receiving devices, aimed through its station WJZ to make "listening in" popular, resulting in the wide sale of receiving apparatus.

To maintain from day to day continuously interesting programs, radio officials constantly search for new features. News events, therefore, which attract the attention of millions are eagerly sought after. They are the most popular offerings of the broadcasting stations. Orchestras, lectures, operatic singers—regular radio features—are backed from the boards when an event such as the Dempsey-Firpo fight takes place.

Program managers, like city editors, are constantly on the watch for "news" broadcasting features. Events are singled out months ahead. WJZ at the present time has its entire football program lined up for this fall. Other big news events which will be covered by radio in the near future are the polo matches between the British and American teams at which the Prince of Wales is expected to be present the match race between Epinard, famous French race horse and an American horse; the Firpo-Wills prizefight; the World's Series baseball games.

However, the prize news event of this fall—the presidential election returns—will not be broadcast, according to present plans. It is said, the Western Union Telegraph Company, which cooperates with the Associated Press in collecting election results in every state in return for permission to sell the results to public gatherings, has been requested by the A. P. not to release vote figures to radio companies.

Just what is the attitude of the radio companies toward the newspapers and news?

"It is not our business to compete with the newspapers," he declared. "We have no desire to 'scoop' them on any news event. When we broadcast a sport contest it is merely as an added feature to our regular program. We have never attempted regular news reports, nor have we ever hired reporters to furnish us news for broadcasting. The A. T. & T. is chiefly interested in the commercial side of radio and is conducting researches in that field.

"Radio advertising sold by WEAF does not compete with newspapers. We need a new term for 'radio advertising' for it is not truly advertising. Everything we put on the air is carefully 'edited' to eliminate features the radio public would resent. No direct advertising is broadcast. Prices or names of firms are not carried in connection with an article mentioned. The general form is to annouce that the next feature on the program is by courtesy of the '——— Manufacturing Company.'"

SMACKS OF EFFICIENCY

Remodelled Plant of the Lowell (Mass.) Courier-Citizen

To make available radio broadcasting to firms which cannot erect stations of their own, WEAF is providing facilities for their use, it was explained. Such firms are allowed the privilege of presenting amusement, entertainment and educational programs just as though they had their own station.

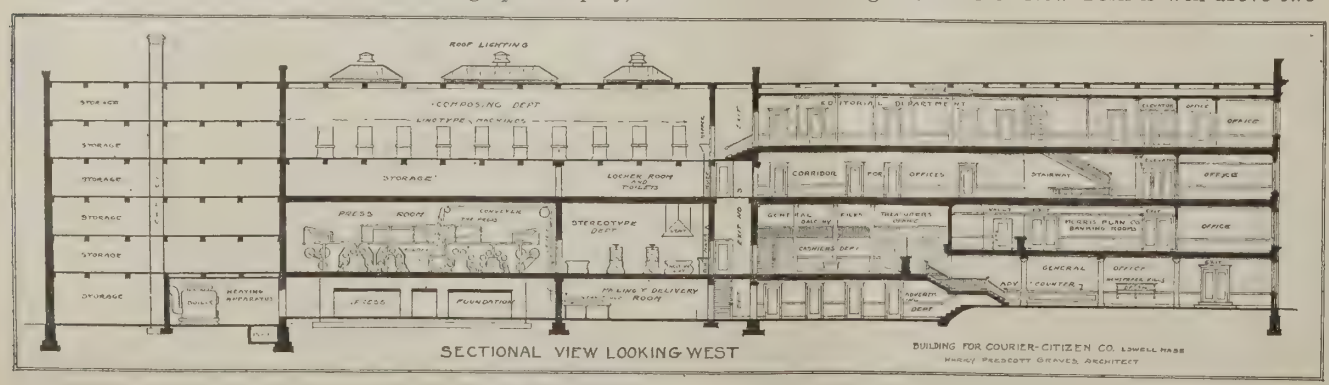
For an evening talk WEAF charges at the rate of $200 for 10 minutes. A musical program is allotted half an hour's time for the same price. The charge for morning broadcasting is exactly half of the evening charge for the same time. A discount of 10 per cent is allowed for a contract of 10 talks or more. Musical programs get the discount on 13 or more appearances.

Four salesmen are employed by WEAF to sell radio advertising. These men stress the "good will" feature of broadcasting.

"We invariably recommend the use of newspaper advertising, in connection with radio," an official declared.

The results of a year's work has proved that radio is adapted to service as a good will medium and that success is based largely upon the value or service which the features render to those listening in, it was stated. For this reason, the very best entertainers, dance orchestras and lecturers are frequently employed by the users of the station. Educational talks are not permitted to give the price of any article, nor to discuss its trademark identification or the place that it may be purchased.

Among the 250 firms which have used radio advertising during the past year are, American Chicle Company, Bank of America, Borden & Co., Columbia Phonograph Company, Corn Products Refining Company, Gold Dust Corporation, Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company, Happiness Candy Stores, National Carbon Company, Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company, Proctor and Gamble and the United States Sugar Association.



WJZ, by terms of its agreement with the A. T. & T. cannot broadcast for pay, but is highly interested in broadcasting news, according to Charles B. Popenoe, program manager. He declares radio holds no menace for newspapers.

"We want to broadcast general news and we have tried to get it, from the Associated Press, but without success," he declared. "We are hoping that someday an arrangement can be made. At present we confine our activities to special sport contests, speeches, and other available events. It is not our intention to form a news gathering organization. Several months ago we turned down the proposition of a newspaper man who wished to form such a group. What could it cover? Crimes, divorce trials, accidents. We are not interested in sending this type of news into the homes.

"We picture the typical radio audience as composed of the man, his wife and their children seated in the parlor of their home. We could not broadcast scandal and crime to them and survive. You can lock your door against the 'scandal' newspaper, not against radio."

Mr. Popenoe cannot visualize the radio ever becoming a serious rival of the newspaper. "Listeners in" cannot select items which interest them as they do in the newspaper—they must listen to the program as it comes, or cut off. And even when sport contests are broadcast radio fans buy newspapers just the same, Popenoe declares.

The radio audience in the metropolitan district, which includes the area within 50 miles of New York is well above two million, both WEAF and WJZ estimate, although there are no absolute figures obtainable. WJZ estimates there are 750,000 receiving sets in this area, with three listeners to each set.

FORMER WAREHOUSE IS NOW FINE PLANT

Lowell Courier-Citizen in New Home Said to Be One of Best in New England — Luxuriously Furnished and Efficient

THE Lowell (Mass.) Courier-Citizen and Evening Leader moved recently into their new building in Kearney Square, regarded as one of the best in New England.

The building was remodelled from an old mill warehouse, the construction of which lent itself admirably to remodeling for a news plant. There is ample room for expansion over a period of many years.

In its remodelled state, the building has 4 stories, averaging 12 feet each. The ground floor of one front section is devoted to the general business office, the advertising, circulation and accounting departments. It is luxuriously furnished. The business executive offices are on a mezzanine floor. The second and third floors have been rented for office purposes. The editorial offices occupy the top floor.

The second section houses the mechanical departments. On the top floor is the composing room, just back of the editorial department. It is equipped with 11 Mergenthaler linotypes, 5 of which are new model 8's. The news copy bank is located near the news machines, while the display machines are near the advertising bank. In the advertising section there are two Ludlow type-casters and an Elrod rule and slug caster. On the same floor are located a pair of Hoe automatic steam tables and a double action molding table. The matrixes, when molded, are dropped through a chute into the stereotype foundry two floors below. Another chute carries all dead metal into the foundry for re-melting.

On the next floor is the stereotype foundry, equipped with new machinery, including a Hoe finishing machine, a Hoe front finishing machine and the latest in saws and trimmers for flat work.

The press is on the same floor, which makes for easy handling of the plates from the stereotypers. The press is new—a straight-line octuple of the R. Hoe make of 64-page capacity. The control board is located on a mezzanine above the floor.

The conveyor from the press runs into the mailing and distribution room on the ground floor. A right-of-way running beside the building permits the circulation department's trucks to run up to the mailing room door, a factor which facilitates deliveries. In the same right of way is a spur track of the Boston & Maine railroad which makes it possible to unload paper cars right at the building, thus avoiding trucking from the freight yards.

The remainder of the building, comprising another entire section, is devoted entirely to storage, which permits the accumulation of huge stocks of newsprint.

The occupancy of the new building coincided with the 100th anniversary of the Courier-Citizen, and the occasion was marked by a 64-page souvenir edition.

"DING'S" GENIAL PEN REFUSES TO LIBEL LIFE

"It's the Only Human Race We Have, Why Not Be Kind to It," Eminent Cartoonist and Pulitzer Winner Counsels Colleagues—Condemns Vitriolic Caricatures—Says Ideas Transcend Mere Drawing

By HARLAN S. MILLER

"I DON'T care who is president," a well known cartoonist remarked, "provided his nose is amenable to caricature."

With this dictum Jay N. Darling, the 1924 Pulitzer prize cartoonist, is in complete and hearty disagreement.

First of all Mr. Darling, who signs his cartoons "Ding," holds it axiomatic that all noses, even the most chaste, are defenseless before the caricaturist's pencil.

Second and lastly, "Ding" does care who is president. Unlike some geniuses —incidentally, Ding doesn't believe much in genius—he esteems his country above his art.

It follows that should a prophet arise with an impeccable nose, a nose defiant of distortion, Ding would not hold it against him at the polls.

That is to say, Ding takes his government seriously, although he is not averse to giving it an occasional dig in the ribs, or chucking it under the chin. Caricature is merely one of its by-products.

It is significant that while he might in fun augment the Hughes whiskers and moustachio, or magnify the Hoover chin dimple or the Wallace eye-brows, so people who have never seen them can recognize them, he values this trio as the ablest public servants within sound of the republic's voice.

If you define genius as hard work dressed up in its starched shirt, he is willing to concede a conscientious government official the appellation. And he believes most officials are profoundly and eagerly conscientious.

Ding believes, moreover, that a cartoonist should not be hyper-critical, violent or vitriolic in his attacks on officials. He maintains that the effective admonition is the sweetly sugar-coated.

Thus it was with a muffled bludgeon that he won the $500 Pulitzer award, voted him as he was on his way back from a two-month vacation in Europe.

Rival caricaturists whose rapiers are smeared with no healing unguent estimate that this is something less than half of one per cent of his yearly income.

He arrived from Europe without heralding—no one met him or notified him of the prize, and he was ignorant of the award until he fished a Columbia university envelope, that looked as though it concealed a circular, from his waste basket.

Although he is still staff cartoonist for the Des Moines Register, an independent morning newspaper of Republican tendencies, which he joined in 1906, he has also been on the staff of the New York Tribune since 1917. The Tribune syndicates his cartoons to 110 newspapers of all shades of political and editorial views. Thus 110 newspapers printed the Pulitzer prize cartoon.

It was a drawing in four parts, of non-political import. Each part depicted the career of an easily recognizable national figure, from humble and obscure boyhood to his place with the mighty.

A goodly fraction of Ding's drawings are in this vein, broad commentaries on American and international life, not one whit contentious.

But often his sketches embody views sharply at variance with the editorial policies of some of his 110 newspapers, and yet are by them prominently displayed. In this way the cartoonist achieves somewhat the stature of a Fifth Estate.

By the terms of his agreement with the Tribune, Ding spends 4 months of each year in New York. The other eight he lives at his home, in Des Moines, Ia.

"There is less pressure out there against a man's brain and brush," he explains, "fewer suave enthusiasts for and against everything. Moreover, I have grown accustomed to the way we live in Iowa, and so find it more comfortable to live that way."

So much for the many who detect some esoteric philosophy in Mr. Darling's adherence to his Hawkeye prairies.

J. N. DARLING

During the Democratic Convention, Ding, as is his wont when sojourning in Manhattan, took possesion of a sedate hotel suite and disguised it with palettes, drawing stands, boxes of paints, brushes, ash trays, piles of photographs and clipped pictures until it resembled a studio after a minor hurricane.

This time it was the Algonquin, and Ding, a brawny six-footer or thereabouts, with a habit of making himself comfortable, had eliminated any urban hauteur the suite originally may have possessed. Cigars, books, cigarettes and magazines lay about.

The Democrats had adjourned a few minutes before, and already the cartoonist, with his sleeves rolled up, was squared away before a 30 by 20 sheet of stiff drawing paper, on a draughtsman's stand in the light of a bay window.

On the paper, under a rain of swift brush strokes, Smith and McAdoo were emerging as the Kilkenny cats. As in the legend, their tails, tied together, suspended them from a clothesline, and their claws tore at each other.

It was a prophetic picture, drawn early in the balloting, for Smith and McAdoo later emulated the cats and clawed away until little remainded but their tails. As he sketched he smoked and talked.

Ding's brow is broad, high and streamlined against faddist breezes. His features are large, sympathetic and tolerant, with eyes that are deceptively merry when he is most earnest. His facial lines bear the imprint of smile infrequently seen. His hand is amazingly, disproportionately swift at the end of a heavy arm slung from a broad shoulder.

There was, however, an interlude when it wavered. Well might Ding have added a fifth strip to his prize cartoon of greatness snatched against great odds.

Few know that 12 years ago, as he stood on the threshold of national recognition, that right arm hung helpless at his side, virtually crippled in a hunting accident.

First he tried to learn to utilize his left arm. Then during two years of stubbornly unconceded disability he held his brush in his right, its fingers and arm muscles quite limp, and furnished motive power by pulling it across the paper with his left. Eventually specialists restored use of the arm, but not before he had bridged a 24-month crisis that yawned menacingly across his career.

"Julian Mason wants this and three others by eight-thirty," said Ding, with a trace of pride. "These conventions give you a whiff of battle smoke. I feel young again." He looked permanently young, and behaved so.

A waiter was setting the table for dinner. Ding takes most of his meals, during such emergencies, in his own rooms. Friends accused him of avoiding the dining room downstairs for fear that he might encounter a bevy of colyumists and critics. This explanation he waved aside and insisted "It's cozier up here."

Ding's father was a Methodist minister, who never sojourned more than two years in any pulpit. Fate and the Conference decreed that he be born at Norwood, Mich., on the lake shore.

When he reached the gawky years he was living in Sioux City, Ia. From there he went to college, to absorb the scientific preparation for a medical course.

Science must have seemed a gaunt and austere taskmistress, for he sought relaxation in horseplay which blinded a sensitive faculty to the fact that his grades were good. . . .

It was a warm Democratic night, and as Ding gave recognition to the potatoes hashed in cream, he declined to remember all the schools that had expelled him. It was a subtle revenge; or so it must seem to the schools obliterated. Obviously Beloit University expelled him more tactfully than elsewhere; in Beloit's favor he made a solitary exception and remembered her kindly.

With the pedagogic tincan athwart his ambitions, Ding heard in its rattle no dirge; only an "I'll show 'em!" refrain. Like many another collegian, he became a journalist temporarily to earn tuition money, so he could return to his skeletons and scalpels in a year.

A husky, willing youth, he became police reporter, city hall man, sporting editor and staff photographer for the Sioux City Journal. That was before the day of specialized journalists.

In college he had been an awkward bashful exhibit, by his own avowal. Suave classmates and co-eds froze him in strange postures, tongue-tied.

"I still get sea-sick when I have to meet a roomful of strangers," he explains. And so in revenge he carried a pad and pencil and caricatured those who embarrassed him most.

On his several runs for the Journal, he still carried his pad and pencil. During lulls he would reduce an unsuspecting prominent citizen, at a banquet or a trial, to the equality of caricature. One day he thus embalmed an irascible pioneer attorney, the local Cato, during a school board meeting.

Shortly afterward this same short-tempered Demosthenes blew up during an argument in court and lambasted his colleague, the opposing counsel, with a walking stick.

This was a novel performance, and the city editor yanked Ding from a hot story about the horseshoe tournament, and sent him to get the violence gentleman's photograph.

The assignment was a stalemate. Ding's quarry had never had his picture taken, and announced thunderously that he never would. To cover his chagrin, Ding produced the pencil sketch. The city editor recognized his man instantly, and ran the caricature, probably no more flattering than a photograph would have been, on page one.

The Journal printed his whole sketch-book gallery as an alphabet of Sioux City celebrities. As a result Ding, then 24 years old, became engrossed in his cartoons, and abandoned his medical career.

Sometimes he regrets this, and surgery is still his foremost hobby. He reads surgical works, and is absorbed in intricate operations performed by some of the republic's leading surgeons who are among his friends.

This defection occurred in 1901. Five years later, when he joined the staff of the Register at Des Moines, his Iowa farmer was a recognized type, and he had stressed the hitherto unremarked resemblance between Uncle Sam and Farmer Corntossel, till it was limned in the national consciousness.

Today he has built a comfortable fortune with the characteristic black lines from his pencil and brush. (Even a Ding pig can be recognized anywhere as a Ding pig.) He drops in to size up the League of Nations at first hand, in its Geneva seclusion, as informally as he goes to the Iowa state fair for other data. He is having his young son and daughter educated in Europe, perhaps with the hope that they will love Iowa more. He has exchanged ideas with many, perhaps most, of the Republic's grandest vegetables, as the French say. Not because he is sociable, alone, but because he holds that a cartoonist ought to know his victims.

"A cartoon," says Ding, "is an illustrated figure of speech. Too many of them are merely mixed metaphors. Far too many are guilty of hyperbole. They exaggerate.

"What they exaggerate most of all is the wickedness of public officials. An unkind cartoonist, and there are too many of him, condemns a whole government with a few brisk strokes.

"It is far too easy to criticize and slam well-intentioned, honest officials through caricature. A conscientious cartoonist will not poison the wells of public opinion by attributing false motives to personages whose heads are momentarily above the mob-line. It is too easy to foster baseless suspicion. The public usually is suspicious enough.

"The cartoonist with a warning or a message must sugar-coat it or become a common scold.

"This is the only human race we have. Why not be kind to it?"

The inspired cartoonist who dashes off a masterpiece in a mad frenzy, Ding testifies, is as rare in real life as the indomitable reporter of fiction, who wins a job as dramatic critic by climbing into the city hall through the transom and foiling a political plot.

"The 10-minute-a-day cartoonist is a myth," devastates Ding. "To keep a mind fit for caricature, the pictorial critic must flex his mental muscles constantly, by reading, by study and by contacts.

"Inspiration will not come to his rescue, galloping on a winged white elephant. He must grope for the message, and then he must study the public's psychology for the best way to convey it.

"In conveying it, he cannot be temperamental or toplofty. A cartoonist may well adopt for his motto: 'Reason with the public; don't dictate to it.'

Ding was smiling benignantly at some outlandish cheese, in lieu of dessert, which may or may not be an outgrowth of his last trip abroad. Suddenly the smile vanished.

"Here I am, preaching again," he acknowledged. "Well, if I am, I'm preaching at the thousands of hopeful parents of hopeful cartoonists who think the 'funny pictures' offer a good, clean if dishonest way of making a living for a youngster who's so ornery and incapable of everything else that he must have artistic genius.

"If all the aspiring cartoonists I meet every year were laid end to end, they would form a wriggly line clear around the White House, and high enough to protect it—even against cartoonists.

"Many of these youngsters are graduates of art schools, and can draw rings around me. But they don't know what the world's all about. They are too lazy to learn. Yet that's just why their folks want them to become cartoonists—because they're incorrigibly lazy.

"Why, the poor cartoonist,"—and here Mr. Darling's face assumed a solemn and sympathetic expression—"the harassed cartoonist spends more hours at work than anyone else in the shop.

"That brilliant symbolism having to do with the cow's whimsy toward her milk pail, expressed in kicks, and the inspired stuff about summer boarders, is good only once or twice a season. There are gaps to fill with ideas.

"Still, without any ideas whatever a caricaturist can always ruin a man's reputation, by pitiless cartooning."

Harshness and vitriol, however, are more frequent in the sketches of Europe's "pictorial critics" than in this mellow, live-and-let-live republic, Ding has concluded. There "pitiless cartooning" is the rule.

"The idiom of expression varies greatly between Europe and America," he said. "They use the bludgeon.

"The continental caricaturist is even more violent than his British colleague. The Britons are leaning toward geniality.

"But even the continentals are corking their rapiers. The youngsters among them are more generous. They yield a better admixture of humor.

"On the whole, I think caricature is discarding its ancient flair for lampooning." Ding knows his Voltaire. If he doesn't regard this as the best of all possible worlds, he is convinced, at least, that it is the champion world extant.

ALL IN THE DAY'S WORK

Drawn for Editor & Publisher

By HUBBELL REED McBRIDE

Originator of "The Ark Age" Will Draw for Macfadden Tabloid

"Praise from Sir Hubert ——"

"STRUGGLING ARTIST" may sound bromidic to casual readers, but to Hubbell Reed McBride, newspaper cartoonist, creator of the comic strip "The Ark Age," and now illustrator and cartoonist for the Macfadden publications, it has fresh and poignant meaning.

H. R. McBride

Today McBride "has arrived" as they say. He has perfected an individual style. His drawings are widely known. He is a consistent contributor to Life and other publications. In his spare time he is completing a series of 36 figures of President Roosevelt—pen drawings—which he says will be the best serious work he has yet done.

It was in 1915 that McBride learned to know what the phrase "struggling artist" means. He was 22 then, and had come to Cleveland from his home on a farm near Mansfield, O., with the hope of "catching on" some place where he could foster his ambition to draw. For a month he worked in a restaurant at $12 a week. Then he found a place in the art department of a local bag company.

His first job as a newspaper cartoonist was with the Newspaper Enterprise Association, where he illustrated jokes and drew an occasional cartoon for a salary of $10 a week.

"I can't draw very well but I've got to have a job" was the way he applied, and it was the utter sincerity of this appeal which won him a place, according to the man who hired him.

After a year and a half with the N. E. A., McBride came to New York.

"Life was hard—I didn't know a soul when I came and I was timid about going after work and charging for it after I got it," he says. "Editor & Publisher gave me my first work in New York. I was drafted into the army after 6 months, and spent 15 months in the army, 8 of them as art director of Air Scout, an air service publication."

After the armistice McBride free lanced in New York for 4 years, trying to popularize a difficult style with little or no results.

He finally hit upon the style shown in the accompanying drawing, in which the drawing of the engraver and the artist is rendered, which he believes is best suited to him.

McBride will draw cartoons for the new Macfadden evening tabloid to be launched in New York soon.

MUST GROW TIMBER OR FACE PAPER CRISIS!

U. S. Forest Service Experts Report Astonishing Findings in Pulpwood Survey—Amazing Increase in Consumption Without Corresponding Conserva tion or Reforestation—Conditions Which Every Newspaper Publisher Should Study

By ARTHUR ROBB, Jr.

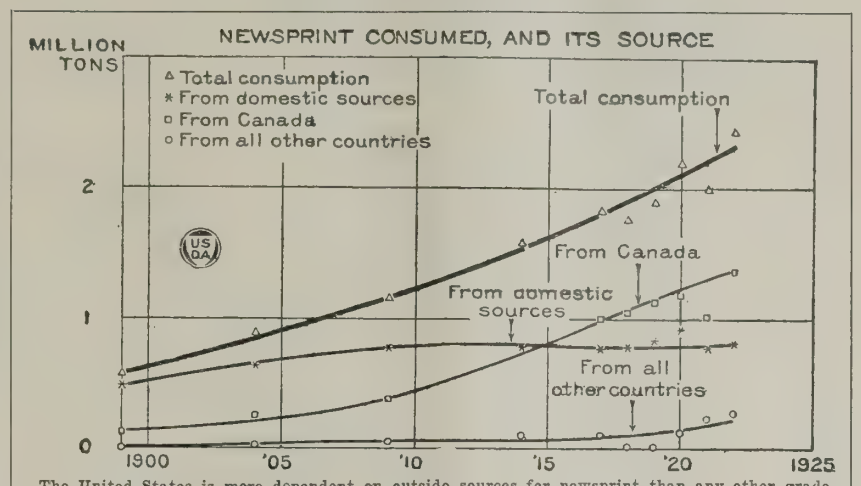
FIVE million tons of newsprint.

Thirteen and a half million tons of all kinds of paper. The last figure is stated, the first implied, as American requirements for 1950 in Bulletin 1241, U. S. Department of Agriculture, "How the United States Can Meet Its Present and Future Pulpwood Requirements." This document, a deep and detailed survey of the present and future of the chief raw material of paper, is the work of Earle H. Clapp, assistant forester and Charles W. Boyce, forest examiner, both of the U. S. Forest Service.

For the benefit of those not familiar with the present figures of the paper industry, it might be said that the figures cited represent double the tonnage of 1922, which are three times those of 25 years ago—1899. The use of paper per capita has increased 90 pounds, from 57 to 147, between 1899 and 1922, and a similar increase during the next twenty-five years, with the expected increase of 40,000,000 in population during that time, would involve a total paper consumption of 18,000,000 tons.

Conservatism, therefore, has characterized the quoted estimate of the report, in which some allowance has been made for factors which would make for a decreased rate of increase.

Any newspaper man can count a dozen or maybe a score of living publishers who were in the newspaper business in 1899, when its total draft on the newsprint mills was 569,000 tons. The 1922 consumption was 2,450,000 tons, and in 1923, it was 2.750,000 tons, probably more. It will not be much, if any, less in 1924.



Now, before getting into the meat of the report, let us look back at the source of the 1899, 1922, and 1923 supplies. In 1899, the report states 83 per cent of the wood from which our newsprint was manufactured came from domestic forests. In 1922, this percentage had dropped to 34. That drop is relative, not actual, for the amount of domestic wood used for newsprint has increased about 450,000 cords in that time.

In 1922 we imported 42 per cent of the newsprint we consumed, all but 5 per cent of the imports coming from Canada, which in 1922 exported 83 per cent of its entire newsprint production. Imports of Canadian newsprint alone in 1922 exceeded the production from American wood, and this in spite of the fact that as recently as 1909 they totalled only 20,000 tons.

American mills also import pulp to the extent of 14 per cent of their consumption, half from Canada and half from overseas. Total imports of newsprint pulpwood in all forms, paper, pulp, and pulpwood, from all countries, are equivalent of 2,050,000 cords of pulpwood. Of this 350,000 cords came from Canada in pulpwood form—more than for any other paper grade. An additional 1,375.000 cords come from Canada in the form of pulp or newsprint.

Transferring the thought from newsprint to the entire paper field, let us state the problem, as of 1922, in this form. It took 9,148.000 cords of wood to supply 1922 paper requirements, of which about 4,498,000 cords were cut in our own forests. We exported the equivalent of 235,000 cords. Pulpwood imports amounted to nearly 1,045,000 cords. The remainder of our requirements, equivalent to 3,840,000 cords, was imported as pulp and paper.

Stated in another way, the American paper industry in 1922 manufactured 7,000.000 tons of paper from domestic and foreign supplies, but we consumed 8,000,000 tons. Our pulp industry manufactured 3,500.000 tons of pulp, in part from imported wood, but 5.847.000 tons were required for our total paper consumption. Finally, we cut from American forests 4,500,000 cords of wood, but the total consumed in the United States and elsewhere to meet our paper requirements was 9,148,000 cords of domestic and foreign wood. Only 88 per cent of the paper consumed in the United States in 1922 was manufactured in this country; only 60 per cent of the pulp used was a home product; and only 49 per cent of the wood used came from our own forests.

The United States is more dependent on outside sources for newsprint than any other grade of paper. We draw more heavily on Canadian forests than our own.

And the estimate is that we shall need 15,000,000 cords of wood in 1950!

Shall we get it from Canada? Probably not, as Canada is beginning to object seriously to letting unmanufactured wood cross the border. And Canada is beginning also to reach the limits of expansion, some observers say. Is Europe the source of the future? Hardly. Sweden is already removing the full annual growth from her forests and Norway is overcutting hers, as is Finland. Apparently, the report goes on, the only country in the world which offers the opportunity for a long sustained increase in pulpwood supplies commensurate with the increasing world demands is Russia, including Siberia, and a large part of the Russian forests are inaccessible. Europe, when it recovers, will need more paper than it can purchase now. The Near East and the Orient, Latin America and the gradually settling parts new to civilization will demand paper from the nearest points of supply, and Uncle Sam's children can expect to pay well in competition with the world if their supplies of paper are to come from beyond borders. That is leaving out of consideration political exigencies which might shut off outside supplies of pulpwood; that consideration is hardly negligible.

These are purely negative arguments the report advances for a domestic source for all our pulpwood requirements.

On the positive side, it is set forth that regions with large areas of forest land can be made centers of the same permanent development as areas of rich agricultural lands. Both produce crops which differ only in kind. A thriving timber industry is as basic in character as agriculture. Upon timber crops can be founded permanent local wood-using industries, such as pulp and paper manufacture. On the other hand, extensive areas of idle forest lands are a public burden. As long as they remain idle, transportation facilities can not be supported, taxes on productive property are increased, settlement is hampered, and social progress is retarded.

European pulpwood supplies, it is pointed out, now come from cultivated forests. Canadian supplies will also have to be grown by forestry if they are to remain a factor of importance. The United States has on the whole much more favorable growing conditions than either Eastern Canada or Northern Europe, the main sources of our imports, and we should therefore secure larger yields in shorter period from our own lands. Water power, fuel, and materials other than wood for manufacture of paper are abundant in the United States. Thus the more nearly independent the United States can become of foreign wood supplies, the less likely we are to be subject to dictated prices from outside sources of excessive prices resulting from world competition.

However, for the period during which paper or its constituent materials can be obtained more cheaply from foreign than domestic sources, importation is a sound measure of forest conservation, eking out our diminishing supply of convertible pulpwood.

The problem of the future is to make that 1950 requirement of 15,000,000 cords of pulpwood at home. Twelve million cords of this will have to be in spruce, fir, and hemlock, the constituents of ground wood and sulphite pulp which are all there is to newsprint and which are essential to a number of other grades of paper.

Of the total timber now standing in the United States about 760 million cords, including jack pine, is suitable for mechanical and sulphite pulp; 850 million cords are suitable for soda pulp, used in book papers; and 1,920 million cords are available for sulphate, which goes into the boards and other coarse papers. All of the Alaskan pulp species are within the sulphite-mechanical group.

The total annual drain on American forests, of which only 2.5 per cent is for pulpwood, is a little short of 25,000,000,000 cubic feet, about one-thirtieth of the total visible wood supply of the United States. Annual replacement through new growth is only 6,000,000 cubic feet, so that our timber resources are decreasing 19,000,000,000 cubic feet, or 160,000,000 cords a year. This drain includes much timber below saw-timber size, the losses in this size being thrice its renewals, thereby reducing the possibility of replacing the larger-size timber by the progressive growth of new wood. The drain upon the larger sized material suitable for saw timber is 5½ times the annual growth.

Now, under forests in the United States are 470.000,000 acres of the original 822,000.000 acres of virgin forest. The outlook is that agriculture will make no further inroads on forest lands and that the present acreage can be taken as the area for the forest cultivation that the future must bring. This total does not include the Alaskan forests, only two of which are considered in the report—the Tongass and the Chugach reservations. These 5,000,000 acres of forest lands may be added to the previous total. Of the present acreage, 138,000,000 acres are still covered with virgin timber, 250,000,000 with volunteer second growth, and 81,000,000, devastated by logging and fire, lack forest growth of any kind.

The forests of practically every region in the United States are being cut much more rapidly than they are being replaced by growth, and in most regions the original timber supplies have been greatly reduced, the pulpwood regions falling within the latter class.

The most urgent phase of the immediate problem is to secure annually an additional 870,000 cords of spruce, hemlock, and balsam, and 180,000 cords of aspen (known in the trade as poplar), to offset pulpwood imports. An important, but less urgent phase of the problem is to secure from American forests the pulpwood required to offset present pulp and paper imports. The total of these immediate and future requirements is a total annual increase in the spruce, fir and hemlock cut of about 3,916,000 cords, in the pine cut of 773,000 cords and in the cut of various hardwoods of 196,000 cords.

A third phase of the problem stated by Messrs. Clapp and Boyce is to meet increasing future paper requirements from our own forests if possible. This based upon the increase in requirements of the past decade or two, would necessitate a further increase in the fir, spruce, and hemlock group of 237,000 cords a year, in the pine cut of 110,000 and in the hardwood cut of 23,000 cords. Upon the basis of possible paper consumption of 13,500,000 cords by 1950, there would be required at that time, under present manufacturing practices, nearly 12,000,000 cords a year of fir, spruce and hemlock, 2 million cords of pine, and a little over 1,000,000 cords of hardwood.

Growing pulpwood is the fundamental solution. Some relief may be expected from new or modified pulping processes, whereby the number of species available for pulping purposes can be increased. If such an increase can include species which are still comparatively abundant in the Middle Atlantic, New England, and Lake States—the heart of the newsprint industry of the United States—it will be of first importance in relieving the present crisis, Messrs. Clapp and Boyce report. Additional relief may also be had by shifting sulphate pulp production from spruce, fir and hemlock partly or wholly to pine and larch. Elimination of waste in the chemical processes will also help. Only about 45 per cent of the original weight of wood now appears as sulphite pulp, the remainder being lost in the liquor. Reuse of waste paper has grown to 29 per cent of our present total paper consumption, but, with the perfecting of present deinking processes or the discovery of better ones, waste paper can be made to furnish to new paper more than its present 1,850,000 tons a year.

Use of woods and sawmill waste in pulp and paper is another avenue, which has been neglected these past 15 years. About 20,000,000 cords a year of sawmill waste from pulp species cannot be salvaged in lumber manufacture. Only 90,000 cords were used in pulp operations in 1922.

But, important as all these measures are as part of a general program, the investigators say "the main reliance in ultimately and fully meeting our pulpwood requirements must be placed upon the growing of timber."

The possible margin of growth on our present forest area, under intensive forest management, over the present drain, would ultimately amount to about 12,000,000 cords of the pulp species. To this could be added a part of the 11,000,000 cords of pulpwoods not lost annually by fire and disease, but which could be saved by better protection. Alaska's forests can add another 2,000,000 cords a year without depletion of its resources. This total would more than meet the 10,500,000 cords difference between the present cut from our pulpwood forests and the ultimate cut of 15,000,000 cords, and leave plenty for increased use of other wood products. But—the difficulty comes back of the necessary concentration on spruce, fir and hemlock.

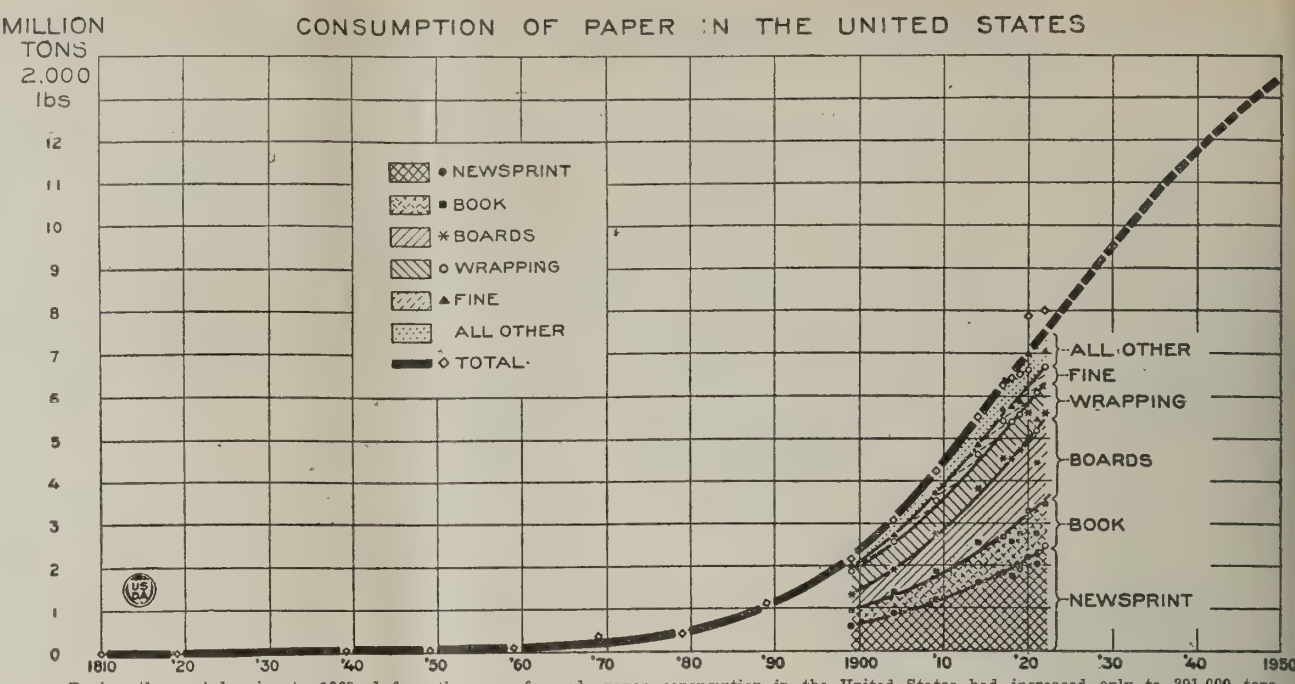
Two solutions of this difficulty—one for now and one for the future—are presented.



"Unfortunately," the report states, "the timber supplies of New York and Pennsylvania are now so greatly reduced in relation to demands, and provisions for their replacements by growing new supplies are still so far short of ultimate possibilities, that a curtailment of pulp production seems to be the only outlook if present pulping processes are continued. How rapid the curtailment will be, and how far it will go, depends primarily upon how soon forest management is applied, with what degrees of intensity, and on what part of the area of the entire spruce-fir type. Increased cutting of pulp timber in the immediate future would merely hasten and aggravate later curtailment. The main effort in the solution of the problem in the Middle Atlantic States must be to increase timber growth.

"The outlook for the immediate future in New England is similar, but less critical because of the larger timber supplies in relation to plant requirements and the smaller pulpwood imports. New Hampshire of the three spruce states, is in the worst situation, and Vermont is in the best. Vermont might succeed in supplying its own mills, but will probably be called upon increasingly to assist New Hampshire and New York. Drastic curtailment is the only outlook for New Hampshire so far as its own supplies are concerned, and reliance upon Maine and Vermont only serves to aggravate the difficulties of these States.

"Michigan's spruce and hemlock supplies are chiefly available for Wisconsin. Wisconsin, with only limited resources of its own, draws its pulpwood largely from Michigan and Minnesota. Minnesota, with anything but a favorable spruce outlook, is trying to eliminate the competition of Wisconsin mills. Eliminating new processes, the only way in which the pulp industry can hold its own is through the increased use of hemlock in competition with the sawmills, and through the possibility, already beginning in fact, of using jack pine. Both of these species are more suitable for sulphite than for mechanical pulp. Both, without intensive forest management, and possibly hemlock in any case, will be purely temporary expedients. Immediate enlargement of the pulpwood cut or of the manufacturing industry, is out of the question without corresponding curtailment later.

"Under present pulping processes, therefore, new regions alone, with ample stocks of virgin timber, offer the only hope in making up in the near future either our 870,000 cords of spruce pulpwood imports or the sum total of our dependence for spruce, fir and hemlock, equivalent to 3,916,000 cords. Half of the latter can be wiped out by a new industry in Alaska; three-fourths can be secured from the forests of Washington, Oregon, and California; one-fourth can be secured from the Rocky Mountain forests in Montana and Idaho. Only the growing of new crops of timber to replace present supplies can afford a basis for permanent plant operation in these new regions."

The outline for the future is less particularized. The possible cut from Alaska, the Pacific Coast and the Northern Rocky Mountain states is placed at about 6,500,000 cords annually. This is conditional upon intensive forest management on all cut-over lands, or at least on restricted areas devoted to pulpwood production. Potential growth on the spruce-fir lands of the Middle Atlantic New England, and Lake States combined, can ultimately, under similar methods, exceed 6,000,000 cords. Use of spruce for other purposes than pulpwood might be offset by utilization of more or less jack pine, possibly also hemlock, for sulphite, and by cutting spruce and hemlock in the Southern Appalachian states. The total for East and West would barely meet a 12,000,000 cord requirement of spruce and fir pulpwood, and the Eastern contribution would not be available until long after 1950.

During the period prior to 1869, before the use of wood, paper consumption in the United States had increased only to 391,000 tons. Since that time consumption based chiefly on paper from wood has increased to 8 million tons. A smaller rate of increase than that of the last two decades would bring consumption to 1,950 to 13½ million tons. Paper consumption by grades is shown by cumulative curves.

"Public interest in the pulp and paper problem carries public responsibility to aid in its solution," the report concludes. "The supplies of pulp wood, lumber, and other forest products and the profitable utilization of the forest land constitute merely two phases of one of our most important national problems. The public is interested in securing permanent, as contrasted with temporary, industries. It is interested also in securing ample future supplies of paper at reasonable prices.

"The public must redeem its responsibility by enlarging the area of publicly-owned forest lands and devoting such lands in part to the growing of pulpwood. In co-operation with private owners, it must extend and improve protection against fire, insects, and disease. It must solve the question of forest taxation, which in its present form helps to discourage efforts by private owners to grow their own timber supplies. It must encourage the development of satisfactory forms of timber insurance. It must aid in forest products research into pulpwoods and pulping processes. To supplement present knowledge, it must, in co-operation with the pulp and paper industry, extend and enlarge the research of forest experiment stations in methods of reforestation, timber-growing, and protection.

"It must also secure fuller data on the adjustment of needs and supplies. Although the general information available amply justified action along the lines suggested, much more accurate and detailed data on timber supplies, growth, requirements, and available forest lands are essential for thoroughly satisfactory plans from the standpoint of either the pulp and paper industry or the public. For such data reliance can be placed only upon a timber survey, and in making this the public and the industry must co-operate.

"The interest of the industry in planning and providing for itself ample supplies of raw materials to meet its own future requirements is still more immediate and direct than that of the public and carries corresponding responsibility for the solution of the pulp and paper problem.

"The responsibility of the industry extends to co-operation in the lines indicated—forest protection, forest-products investigations, research at forest experiment stations, and a thorough-going timber survey. It includes systematic and widespread efforts to apply the results of research as rapidly as they become available. Further than all of these, the pulp and paper industry should, to safeguard its own interest, assume the leadership in timber-growing on its own forest lands and those upon which it is dependent for pulpwood supplies. The alternative is scrapping pulp and paper plants or diverting them to other and less essential products affords no real choice."

GREAT NORTHERN CUTS NEWSPRINT PRICE

Reduces Newsprint Quotations from $75 to $70 Per Ton—International Declares It Will Not Abandon $73 Figure

The Great Northern Paper Company has reduced its price for newsprint to $70 per ton from $75.

This $5 reduction per ton is $3 below the price recently set by the majority of Canadian mills and followed by the International Paper Company and other producers in this country.

International and the Canadian concerns early in July lopped $2 a ton off the $75 figure, which had stood on contracts drawn up since the first of 1924.

Paper authorities point out that several years in the past Great Northern has quoted a figure below the majority of other newsprint makers.

That the International Paper Company does not intend to quote newsprint below $73 a ton, or $3.65 per cwt., during this year at least, was stated to EDITOR & PUBLISHER this week by Joseph L. Fearing, sales manager.

Mr. Fearing took great pains to explain his company's position, declaring it was "to the interest of newspaper publishers as well as newsprint manufacturers to keep the price at $3.65 per cwt.," a figure, which he insisted was "absolutely fair."

Regarding the reduction made by Great Northern, Mr. Fearing limited himself to the comment that "some mills of course may have an economically better strategic position than others."

"We already have met the price quoted by the majority of Canadian mills," he said.

"The American publishers realize that it is cheaper to produce paper in Canada than it is in the United States.

"Our position is, therefore, one of wonder as to how anyone can consider it possible for American mills to make prices lower than the Canadian concerns.

"We believe we have taken a fair stand in meeting the Canadian figure of $3.65 per cwt."

M. S. Walker and his giant camera.

THE most exciting play in the baseball game was that slide to second base in the "lucky seventh."

Ground rules prevented most of the camera men from snapping the picture.

That long green thing, however, that looks like a cannon aimed from the grandstand behind the backstop, 100 yards away, has the graphic story told on a plate, ready to be developed and reproduced in tomorrow's newspaper.

It is the long range camera, invented by M. S. Walker, manager of the photographic department of the New York American. As a photographer who too frequently saw that exciting play missed by fellow camera men, Walker got busy, and after a year's hard work produced this long distant giant, which, according to claim, is the largest practical newspaper camera in the world.

Measuring 5 feet long, this Leviathan of cameras weighs 100 pounds despite the fact that it is made of aluminum. The fifty-seven and one-half inch lens alone weighs 40 pounds.

This lens, the secret of the camera's power of bringing subjects from 300 feet away up to the equivalent of 20 feet for smaller cameras, was manufactured in Germany. It is a copy of lenses used by Hun airmen during the war, long kept secret by the Germans from the rest of the world.

Two men are required to manipulate this photographic monster, which sits on a tripod made like a battle ship's gun pivot, capable of revolving around and moving up and down.

It is only one of Walker's camera creations, although it is his latest. Walker has been a newspaper camera man for 20 years, starting first with the New York American, and later transferring to the New York World. He was on the World up to the war, when he enlisted in the army. After the war he joined the photographic staff of the New York Daily News, later returning to the American.

While on the News, Walker constructed a camera about half the size of his latest, which then, known as "Big Bertha," was a sensation in New York newspaper circles. "Big Bertha's" lens measured only 30 inches. He has also invented a camera which makes three almost instantaneous exposures of the same subject, and another which takes 14 pictures 3¼ inches square in a half a second's time.

N. Y. SUN'S "IDEA MILL" PROVING VALUABLE

Business Office Invites Criticism of Methods from "Greenhorns" of Other Departments—Efficiency Ideas Unearthed

An "Idea Mill" with large capacity has been inaugurated in the business department of the New York Sun at the suggestion and under the direction of Edwin S. Friendly, business manager.

The principle of the mill is to improve methods of various departments by reversing the customary theory of having experts investigate.

"Brainy greenhorns ask the experts questions and make suggestions, with the result that many old deep-rooted traditions are being broken for the better," Friendly explained.

Meetings of the Sun's business department heads are held every Saturday. Friendly assigns 3 department heads to investigate another department, about which they know nothing.

"They ask fundamental questions," Friendly continued, "and demand answers."

"A committee, for instance, made up of the circulation manager, the head bookkeeper, and the production manager, investigate the operation of the advertising department.

"The investigators go into the department full of curiosity. They ask all sorts of questions, uncovering minor details that might easily be overlooked by an advertising expert. Their reports are brought up at the regular weekly meeting, discussed, and suggestions made are either rejected or accepted by the business manager.

"Some of the ideas emerging from the mill are of course wonderful and strange. But many are decidedly practical. And altogether it has made the Saturday meetings very interesting."

One result of the plan, which has only been in operation a short while, has been reduction in the number of the advertising checking copies of the Sun, 700 daily, Friendly pointed out.

The system of handling mail in the file room has been changed. A back number room of the Sun has been established. At present a committee made up of the promotion manager, the head of the publication office and the auditor are investigating the press room to discover how many spoiled copies there are daily and why.

NEW IS INVESTIGATING POSTAL COSTS

President's Statement to Postal Employes on Wage Increase Plans Reveals Status of Second-Class Postage Situation

If Congress, at the next session, reenacts the postal employes' salary increase and provides the means of raising the money for the advance, President Coolidge will sign the bill. Virtual assurance on that score was given a delegation of the United National Association of Post Office Clerks, who called at the White House recently. The measure, carrying upwards of $60,000,000 passed at the last session of Congress was vetoed by Mr. Coolidge on the ground that it failed to provide additional revenue.

The President made it plain to the representatives of the postal workers that he appreciated the condition of postal employes, particularly in the larger cities and recognized the need of proper readjustment in salaries, provided that such readjustment would not impose further tax burdens on the people. He stated that he had virtually approved the proposal of Postmaster General New for salary increases aggregating $43,000,000 to be absorbed by increases in second, third, and fourth class matter, the heaviest increase falling on the parcel post.

The New plan provided for $5,000,000 of the additional $43,000,000 of postal expenses to be raised by increases in second class matter. Since the visit of the delegation of postal employes to the White House, President Coolidge has discussed the question briefly with the Postmaster General, but no decision has been reached regarding specific legislation. Mr. New is known to favor a program that will delay action on the salary readjustment until the investigation of the Post Office Department into the cost of handling various classes of mail, has been completed. This investigation is underway.

SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN WINS

U. S. District Court Enjoins Encyclopedia from Using Name

Through a decision just rendered by Judge Learned Hand in the United States District Court, Southern District of New York, the Scientific American Publishing Company is granted an injunction restraining the Encyclopedia Americana Corporation and its subsidiary, "The Scientific American Compiling Department, Inc.," from continuing to use the name "Scientific American" or "Scientific American Compiling Department, Inc.," on any of its present publications without proper qualification to indicate that there is no connection between the publishers of the Encyclopedia and the publishers of the Scientific American.

At one time the Scientific American consented to the use of the term "Scientific American Compiling Department" by the Encyclopedia. The magazine also co-operated in assembling data for the work, which was to be published within a limited time. When the policy of the new organization changed, however, Munn & Co., publishers of the Scientific American, withdrew their consent and sued to restrain the Encyclopedia Americana and the so-called Scientific American Compiling Department from using the name of the Scientific American in connection with the sale of the encyclopedia.

GEORGIA DAILY WINS FARMER SUPPORT BY BOLL WEEVIL CAMPAIGN

Educational Drive by Albany Herald Lauded by Community and Backed by Local Business Firms—S.N.P.A. Enlisted

HOW an intelligently directed newspaper campaign against the boll weevil aided a section of Georgia to successfully combat that destructive cotton pest was told by J. A. Davis, business manager of the Albany (Ga.) Herald at the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association convention held recently at Asheville, N. C.

J. A. Davis

So effectual was the campaign that the S. N. P. A. voted to issue a special bulletin to its members outlining the methods used by the Herald in order that the work might be taken up by newspapers in all parts of the South. How the newspaper carried on its battle has been told by Mr. Davis for Editor & Publisher

"Many years ago, when the South was wedded to the one-crop agricultural system and when cotton was practically the only product of Southern farms, the Herald saw that the South could not enjoy the prosperity to which it was entitled if it continued to adhere to the one-crop system of farming," he declared. "More than 20 years ago the Herald inaugurated its 'Hog, Hominy and Hay' campaign, the result of which was to develop a wide diversity of farming in southwest Georgia, to make the farms more nearly self sustaining, leaving cotton as a surplus money profit crop.

"But as it was impossible for the South to enjoy its fullest prosperity by raising cotton alone, and so it has developed that the South can not enjoy its fullest prosperity without the production of cotton. As long as the South permits the boll weevil to destroy from 60 to 75 per cent of the cotton it plants it will feel the effects of this large economic loss. This is not only true of the whole South, but of any section of the South. It costs money to plant and cultivate cotton, and if that cotton is not harvested a loss results which curtails prosperity and progress."

"For three years prior to 1924 the boll weevil had taken a heavy toll from the cotton harvest of southwest Georgia. Farmers who had experimented with various methods of boll weevil poisoning had made discouraging failures. When the planting season of 1924 approached, there was a spirit of pessism in this section. Farmers were disheartened and business men were discouraged.

"Fortunately, expermental work which had been carried on by the Armour fertilizer Company on a cotton farm near Albany had demonstrated that the boll weevil could be controlled, that cotton could be successfully and profitably grown under boll weevil conditions.

"The Albany Chamber of Commerce made the boll weevil fight, one of the planks of its program for 1924 and sought the co-operation of the Herald in getting the information to the farmers and in building up their morale, which had been completely shaken by the unsuccessful experiments with boll weevil poisoning in previous years. A simple, efficient and economical method of poisoning was prepared and the Herald undertook to 'sell' this method to the farmers of southwest Georgia.

"The Herald took the position that the farmers were in no condition to experiment any further in their fight against the boll weevil, but the experimentation should be left to the agricultural departments of the State and the United States and to such large interested industries as were able to carry it on. In an intensive campaign which lasted for 4 weeks the Herald urged the farmers to use the one method which had been proved to be efficient, and to stick to that method just as closely as possible.

"The campaign was opened up with a screamer printed in red across the top of the first page of the paper—'Southwest Georgia Must Lick the Boll Weevil.' In the same paper was a strong editorial calling upon the farmers to poison and to poison in the right way. The paper also carried a two-colored advertisement, half-page size, of the Albany Chamber of Commerce giving the simple method which any farmer could understand and easily use. For several days a red screamer was carried on the front page and editorials urged upon the farmer the importance of winning the fight.

"In a few days, the Herald augmented the appeal it was making to the farmers by publishing a series of half-page two-color advertisements from the leading business enterprises in the community, throwing behind the Herald's campaign the weight of endorsements from conspicuously successful enterprises in many lines of business—banks, wholesale houses, railroads, manufacturers, etc.

"The effect of this campaign was almost immediately felt. Soon everyone in southwest Georgia was talking about the boll weevil fight. The merchants and supply people were quickly sold on the idea and every time the farmer came in contact with these people he was urged to poison and to poison by the method which the Herald was advocating. Other papers in the territory took up the campaign and it became the all-absorbing topic of interest during the month of May when it was so important for the poison campaign to begin.

"It is too early yet to determine just what the ultimate results af the campaign will be, but a survey shows that about 87 per cent. of the farmers of this section have applied poison this year by the approved method. There are fewer boll weevils in the territory than there have been in a number of years and the prospects for a good yield of cotton are finer than they have been for five or six years.

"The Herald has never done anything which strengthened so much the good will it enjoys as the boll weevil campaign. Both the business men and the farmers are enthusiastic in their acclaim over an effort which they state has saved southwest Georgia hundreds of thousands of dollars.

77% Gain in Sales Marks 52nd Year in Business

Cribben & Sexton use Chicago Tribune space to Merchandise More Universal Stoves

Every advertising salesman encounters this line of talk:

"Young man, this was a successful concern before you were born. We have never done any advertising, but our factory is busy year in and year out. Dealers buy our product on its merits. We pay our profits out in dividends and we don't need any smart ad man to tell us how to pay them out for white paper or blue sky."

There are many splendid businesses which have been built without advertising. But the experience of Cribben & Sexton shows that past triumphs are no more an answer to the story of this great business force than the excellent qualities of the horse or the kerosene lamp counterbalance the advantages of the automobile or electric light.

807 Universal Dealers listed on this page—a gain of 43% as a result of One Year of Chicago Tribune Advertising

Cribben & Sexton, manufacturers of Universal Stoves and Ranges, began business in Chicago half a century ago. They have warehouses in five other cities from which their dealers, scattered from coast to coast, are supplied. In New York, as well as in Los Angeles, this old Chicago firm is a big factor in the stove business.

One year ago, however, Cribben & Sexton undertook to stimulate sales throughout The Chicago Territory (Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Michigan and Wisconsin) by means of Chicago Tribune advertising. A page a month in The Sunday Tribune was contracted for. Based on this campaign, an intensive effort was made to secure dealers in the 502 major towns in each of which The Chicago Tribune reaches one-fifth or more of the families.

In one year, Cribben & Sexton increase their dealer organization by 43%

This drive began on July 1st, 1923. Cribben & Sexton then had 565 dealers in these five states. Today, after one year of Chicago Tribune advertising, they have 807 dealers, a gain of 43 per cent.

Furthermore, the old dealers have sold more Universal Stoves than they ever did before. During the year 1923 Cribben & Sexton sales outside The Chicago Territory were 6 per cent greater than in 1922. But in the five states of The Chicago Territory (where Chicago Tribune advertising was behind the salesmen and behind the dealers) increase in sales was 77 per cent.

What Cribben & Sexton think of Chicago Tribune advertising is evidenced by their assurance to dealers that 13 more pages will be run during the next year under a non-cancellable contract with The Tribune.

The kerosene lamp gave light, but the incandescent bulb gives more light, better light, and instant service. The horse has worked loyally for mankind for centuries and centuries, but he can't keep pace with the automobile. Impressive successes are possible without advertising, but no man knows the real possibilities of his business until he has geared to it this tremendous stimulating force.
